Ask a Tribune man to call and tell you how the vast prestige of The Chicago Tribune, won by 77 years of success and of advertising in this community, can be fitted into your merchandising problems. There is more to Chicago Tribune advertising than the mere purchase of space. We recognize the vital and strategic positions held by jobbers and dealers. We look upon advertising not as a separate entity in itself but as a force to be closely co-ordinated with selling.

Chicago Tribune men are familiar with merchandising as well as with advertising. They have conducted sales campaigns in The Chicago Territory for various lines of business. From repeated contacts with wholesaler and retailer, as well as with manufacturer, they know how to get maximum value from advertising dollars. You place yourself under no obligation in asking a Tribune man to call. You may find, as Cribben & Sexton did, that The Tribune has something worth while to tell you.

NEARLY 500 PRESS TELEGRAPHERS THREATEN NATION-WIDE STRIKE

United Press, United News, Universal Service, and International News, Conducting Last Minute Negotiations On Wage Scale

UNION leaders and the managements of the United Press Associations, United News, Universal Service, and International News Service were seeking means of averting a threatened strike which would call out nearly 500 press telegraphers as EDITOR & PUBLISHER went to press this week.

Both sides admitted that a last minute conference might result in agreement.

A strike vote, however, was being taken, and early returns indicate a large majority of union operators favored a walkout.

The union committee has until midnight Friday to accept or reject recommendations made by Hywel Davies, representative of the United States Department of Labor, providing a 3 year contract with $1 a week increases each year.

The recommendations were accepted by the wire services but were rejected by the union Wednesday this week, and the strike vote called.

Roscoe H. Johnson, international union president, and the union committee chairmen, object to "binding union members" to a 3 year contract, EDITOR & PUBLISHER was told.

They declared they might accept a 2 year contract which would guarantee the total $3 a week increase in pay.

The press services had demanded a reduction of $2.50 a week in the minimum wage, all classes; 50 cents reduction Saturday night extra; 10 cent reduction overtime; $10 reduction on wages of machine operators; and 10 cents reduction on machine operators overtime. They claimed decrease in the cost of living made these reductions justifiable. The management also wanted "vacation with pay" abolished.

The union demanded wage increases ranging from $10.75 to $15.75 a week.

Negotiations started in New York, July 6. Commissioner Liller of the Department of Labor was called in and, when he failed to conciliate the two parties Hywel Davies of the Department of Labor was appointed arbitrator. To him the press association managements submitted a joint brief, and the union committees submitted their demands.

In handing down his recommendations, which rejected the management's demand for abolition of "vacation with pay" and offered the 3-year contract, with $1 a week increase each year, Davies made it plain that his decision could not be considered as "an award," since, within 5 days either party could reject his proposals.

He declared his investigations showed that the "weighted average" of wages paid the Associated Press operators is $1.75 more than that now paid by United Press, I. N. S., Universal, and United News.

Union committeemen, however, contended that this average included "short trick" men, paid lower wages because of the short hours worked daily, and claimed the Associated Press paid its men more than the other press associations.

Present wages now run for day work from a minimum of $41.75 per week up to $60.25 per week; and for night from $47.25 to $60.25.

Karl Bickel, president of the United Press, said his service was well prepared to meet a strike emergency should it arise. The U.P., he pointed out, has widespread machine distribution as far west as the Missouri River, now, also out of Los Angeles, with a new machine service being prepared to operate out of San Francisco.

President Johnson stated that there were very few unemployed press telegraphers available at the present time, since they had found work on the various stock exchanges, because of the boom in food and grain prices.

Willingness to reach a settlement, however, was indicated by both parties.

The present agreement expired June 30.

Following is the notice sent to all union telegraphers signed by the union committeemen, calling for a strike vote:

"All committees and President Johnson rejected 3 year contract, refusing to tie membership hand and foot over such a long period. Managements refuse to put arbitrator's $3 decision in 2 year contract with threat to organize company unions. We know present employes will not operate scab wires. Have members wire overhead immediately your general chairman, authorizing strike midnight, Friday, if our continued efforts fail. Committees ask for full vote and will hold every member accountable who fails wire vote to strike headquarters Aberdeen Hotel, New York."

Committeemen are: United Press Division 47: A. T. Maddux, General Chairman; J. P. Frayn; C. J. McTiernan, Secretary-Treasurer.

Universal Service Div. 97: M. B. Norton, General Chairman.

Representing the press services are: Karl Bickel, president, United Press Associations; George C. Shor, editor and manager, International News Service; Chester Hope, Universal Service.

The Associated Press employs 1,080 telegraphers, and has never dealt with the union.

Rosita Forbes, England's woman explorer, has written a series of 4 articles for the Ledger Syndicate, Philadelphia, entitled "Terrors of the East." In this series the "nerviest woman in all England," as she is dubbed by King George, describes the 4 occasions when she was most afraid.

Advertisements, like men, are judged by the company they keep

Who introduced him? Who are his friends? What company does he keep? These are the questions every man and every woman asks and answers before admitting a stranger to the inner circle of the home.

So, too, with merchandise. The confidence with which you welcome it, is determined in large measure by your regard for the newspaper that first brings it to your attention. This necessarily involves the consideration of the other advertisements commonly carried by the same newspaper.

In Cincinnati a campaign of advertising in the Times-Star is the "Open Sesame" to the worthwhile market. The Times-Star is the home paper of a well-to-do and highly discriminating market of 600,000 people. It is their paper, owned and edited by their fellow Cincinnatians whose interests are identical with their own. Editorially the Times-Star crystallizes the sentiment of the community of which it is so significant a factor.

The Times-Star goes daily into practically every literate, white, English-speaking household within the metropolitan area of "the most American of American Cities." Its daily city circulation is approximately 28,000 greater than that of its evening contemporary and more than 70,000 in excess of the leading morning newspaper.

In display advertising the leadership of the Times-Star is even more pronounced. Last year it carried 4,481,358 lines more than the second afternoon paper in Cincinnati and 2,192,708 in excess of the leading morning newspaper, including its 52 Sunday magazine editions. The preponderance was equally overwhelming in national and in local display. It is even greater now than last year or at any other time in the sixteen consecutive years of its unchallenged supremacy.

GILBERT ANALYZES REPORTERS' TENDENCY TO GILD PUBLIC MEN

FRANK R. KENT, Washington correspondent for the Baltimore Sun, "stirred up the animals" with his waspish article on President Coolidge in the August issue of the American Mercury, wherein he asked the reason for the "curious conspiracy on the part of reporters to keep from the people the facts about public men."

"Here is Frank R. Kent, a clever newspaper man, making the discovery that truth is the hardest thing to tell. Pilate had the same idea a couple of thousand years ago. Probably he had been reading the newspapers of his day and generation. Says Mr. Kent, in Mr. Mencken's American Mercury, there is a 'curious conspiracy among newspaper reporters to keep from the people the facts about public men. . . . There is nothing deliberate about it. Unplanned and unpremeditated, they have been at it for generations. . . . This instinct to anoint and glorify, exalt and protect, is found among the local reporters who write about Sheriffs, County Clerks and City Councilmen, and among Washington correspondents who write about Congressmen, Cabinets and Presidents.'

"Mr. Kent takes Mr. Coolidge as a case in point. 'Here,' he says, 'was the dullest and most ignored and obscure Vice-President in history suddenly pitchforked into the Presidency. As Governor of Massachusetts and as Vice-President he had been a laughing stock for those who watched him function—a thoroughly commonplace, colorless person with a neat little one-cylinder intellect and a thoroughly precinal mind.' And today there exists the 'wise, strong, silent man' legend. This is overproving the case. It isn't anything against Mr. Coolidge that he wasn't highly regarded as Vice-President. A curious tradition requires us to look on all Vice-Presidents as a joke. A Vice-President is as inevitably funny as a man slipping on a banana peel.

"Now, what has brought about the contrast which impresses Mr. Kent so forcibly between the way Mr. Coolidge was regarded a year ago and the way he is regarded today? Two factors: one, Mr. Coolidge himself, and two, human nature. First, Mr. Coolidge has been all that the country has asked for in the way of an Executive, and he has given to a large, influential and vocal element of the community something it is grateful for—a medium for expressing its conservatism. This is important. And, second, what Mr. Kent calls a 'conspiracy of newspaper reporters' is really a conspiracy of human nature itself. Reporters are merely not free from human nature.

"If you ask half a dozen of your acquaintances separately to recommend to you a doctor, each will tell you that his doctor is a wonderful physician. If you want to find a good lawyer, every man will tell you his lawyer is a genius at the law. Every woman will tell you how her minister holds the keys to the gate of heaven. I was at a luncheon given by Lord Northcliffe while President Wilson was in England. A British newspaper man, no child in experience, said to me: 'I'm glad your President is staying with our King. It will do him good to talk to the King. The King, you know, is an awfully wise, level-headed fellow.' I was astounded to have it suggested that the King, whom I had shaken hands with the day before, had more sense than my President. But this British editor—it was his King, you see. The President is his President to every man in the country as well as to every newspaper man in Washington. And it's human to think highly of your President, as well as of your doctor, your lawyer, your dog and your automobile. At least, it is to so many that it does not make as much difference as Mr. Kent says what the reporters write from Washington.

"As for reporters, I should like to meet those 'hard-boiled' ones Mr. Kent talks about. The blase cynical reporter of the stage does not exist. Sometimes one talks like a wise guy, but it is all for show. His wise guidance is like the worldliness of a young collegian. As a class, newspaper men—and this includes Washington correspondents—are the most tender-hearted, sentimental, credulous people in the world. Mr. Arthur Brisbane, advising a correspondent who was approaching thirty that age was as dreadful to a newspaper man as to the beauty, said: 'Young man, you are approaching your grand climacteric. Young man, whatever you do, do not lose your superficiality.' If reporters lost their 'superficiality,' became hard-boiled, critical, penetrated below conventionality, Presidents might be less great, but Vice-Presidents would cease to be a capital joke, Congresses would no longer 'lack the faith of the country,' 'the highest authority' would pale into insignificance, 'fights' would degenerate into poses, Aldermen would stop being excruciatingly funny. Think what it would mean!"

Woonsocket Man Has "K," Burned on Forehead and Wrist

Lucien C. San Souci, a reporter on the staff of the La Tribune, a French newspaper published in Woonsocket, R. I. and a relative of former Governor Emery J. San Souci of Rhode Island, said he was branded with a "K" on his forehead and the left wrist, as the result of trying to "listen in" on a Klan meeting near Woonsocket, on Aug. 5. San Souci heard that there was to be a Klan meeting and went out to investigate and get some information on the ritual of the Klan. While he was hiding in the woods, 3 men approached, San Souci said, wearing white hoods and robes. They grabbed him and more klansmen appeared. When questioned he told them why he was there and then, while some of the men held him, others branded him with a hot iron.

The South is Nature's Treasure-Trove

The treasures supplied by Nature to the South were donated so lavishly that other sections of the country seem almost to have been slighted.

IT has resources in coal and iron ore, petroleum, sulphur, graphite, mica, lead, zinc, quartz and asbestos, enormous stands of yellow pine and oak timber, land so fertile that present volume of farm products could be doubled under intensive methods.

It is calculated that the two score rivers in the South, which now develop about 2,400,000 horsepower, have a capacity to generate nearly four times this amount.

The Southern States are now facing an era of great industrial development. For many years considered a purely agricultural section, the South is now developing its natural resources and is preparing to meet modern industrial conditions in a most progressive spirit.

The South's rapid industrial growth has been the development of an expanding manufacturing industry at home to utilize locally produced raw materials.

The South, rich in natural resources, rich in buying power and rich in merchandising possibilities, is now developing faster and progressing more rapidly than any other part of our land. For your share of business, advertise all merchandise of merit in this list of Southern dailies.

EDITORIAL

MISSIONARY WORK

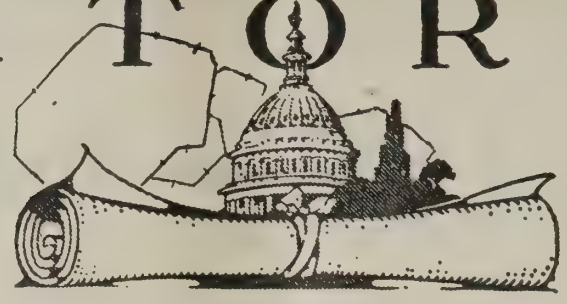
IN your city there is a manufacturer, perhaps several, doing business with the people of the United States through the medium of advertising.

You may know him socially, or through a local commercial organization. He is busy with the responsibilities of his office, buying his raw products, installing modern machinery, dealing with labor, employing executives, managing financial affairs, satisfying his stockholders and directors, watching his competitors and striving to refine and improve his product and give it the widest possible distribution through the most economical means.

Here, then, is the national advertiser. What does he know, in specific terms, of the various forms of advertising media? If he is typical he has only a sketchy idea of the established principles which determine values. It is a detail to him, very often delegated to subordinates.

A newspaper publisher, keenly feeling the subject of newspaper advertising superiority when merchandise distribution co-ordinates with selling publicity, decided within a year to appoint himself a committee of one to show some of his city's national advertisers how to improve their business by substituting newspaper advertising for various other forms of paid publicity. He tells us that he interviewed no less than 30 men, sometimes over coffee cups at his club, sometimes on golf links or at their places of business. He acted as a missionary for a cause from which he would benefit only indirectly, whereas the convert and the city would reap definite and immediate advantages. He laid down the facts as they are printed, week by week in EDITOR & PUBLISHER. He found that men at the heads of huge businesses, spending fortunes for advertising, were often acting in the hazy light of incomplete understanding.

If every publisher in the country would follow the lead of this zealous journalist incalculable benefits would accrue to journalism.



Consider what would happen if, for instance, it would be possible to instill in the consciousness of the manufacturers of the country a single fact revealed in the columns of EDITOR & PUBLISHER last week. We found the milline rate for the 112 daily and 60 Sunday newspapers in the 20 leading cities to be $1.89 for the dailies and $1.71 for the Sundays. These newspapers have a combined circulation of 29,000,000. No one can doubt that they reach all classes of people of those cities and that the man with a worthy product on sale in such cities can use those newspapers and call the fund devoted to such advertising "investment" and not "speculation."

How many manufacturers in the United States, meaning high executives of great corporations, know of a certainty that in buying for $1.89 a line space in a million copies of high-class daily newspapers in 20 leading cities he is paying only about one-half what he would be called upon to pay for the same space in national circulating media, with distribution which cannot often be controlled to co-ordinate with the sale of the merchandise advertised? How many know that some of their advertising is costing them from three to five times what the best newspaper advertising would cost?

Little drops of printer's ink,
Little grains of fact,
Make the dear, old public think—
Sometimes even act.

ALL ADVERTISING PAPER

ONE of the interesting publications you learn about when visiting London is Dalton's Weekly House and Apartment Advertiser. It contains nothing but advertising matter, 90 per cent classified. It is in blanket form, seven columns, and in a recent issue coming to our notice there were about 1,500 separate ads on seventeen pages, attractively composed, each ad carrying a three-line initial letter. The paper sells for two pence and has wide circulation. One insertion of twenty words, or under, costs approximately 35 cents. Evidently the news value in real estate, apartment and boarding house advertisements is of sufficient interest to cause the public to buy this paper. We know of nothing like it in our country.

SMASHING CAMERAS

A NEW YORK camera man was attacked and his camera smashed by an irate actor whose name figures in the week's grist of scandal news. The picture reporter attempted to get a magistrate to issue a warrant. Said the magistrate: "Did you have this man's consent to be photographed?" The photographer replied that such certainly was not the case, and the magistrate thereupon refused the warrant.

It is an old point and a fine one. It is not the disposition of newspapers to take unfair advantage of citizens, yet the best photographs, like the best interviews, would not be obtained for the press if the newspaper men were to go about asking people's consent. An assault and injury to property is something that concerns the processes of law, but perhaps the best method is the old one of picking up the pieces, smiling and forgetting the incident as soon as possible.

Avoid controversy with people, but fight for your principles when you have to, which is most of the time!

HOT STUFF FROM KANSAS

THIS spicy bit of news from the "great southwest empire," is contained in a letter to EDITOR & PUBLISHER from our friend Sidney D. Long, business manager of Wichita Daily Eagle: "We are right in the midst of the wheat harvest just now, out here in Kansas. Every indication points to a record-breaking production—and already new prosperity has commenced. It even looks like we're going to have a peach of a corn crop, too."

Fine business! In the East and the Far West they are going to have a pear of a peach crop, in Maine a turnip of a potato crop, in the south a wool of a cotton crop, and in the great field of advertising we are going to have a bust of a lineage crop, if EDITOR & PUBLISHER is not misled by reports from all sections.

COMMERCIAL RADIO

THE statement of facts in reference to radio broadcasting, appearing in this week's issue of EDITOR & PUBLISHER, is commended to those who for four or five years have been contending that there is no menace in radio.

Radio is today, despite statements to the contrary, a news rival. In recent important news events it has been "creaming the pot," in so far as that section of the public which listens-in is concerned. It is ridiculous to contend that it is a good thing for newspapers to have announcements of news events broadcast through the air. The news of the great political convention contests, of major sporting events, of such national items of interest as a Presidential speech, are among the best newspaper sellers. When you have the result of a horse race or a prize fight, you have the story, in the main, whether you get it through the air or through a newspaper. The broadcasters will carry the running accounts of the world's series ball games and collegiate foot ball games this fall. They promise to "keep off" the presidential election, but we fancy listeners-in will hear something concerning the winners. Radio is in the news business.

We clearly reveal in this issue that radio broadcasting is also in business to sell "publicity advertising." Irrespective of the question whether such advertising can conceivably give commercial results to the advertiser, nevertheless it is another form of publicity on the market, by whatever name it may be called. It is solicited with reservations, such as limited space and clever devices to prevent radio audiences from realizing that advertising is being poured into their ears, but it is advertising.

The newspaper world was led to believe that radio broadcasting would not become commercial, in the advertising sense, and that it would not become competitive in the news sense.

We believe, from what we are hearing, that it is now both commercial and a news rival. The encroachment was to have been anticipated. No one has solved the radio economic puzzle. Without broadcasting the radio equipment business would smash. There would be no purpose in buying sets. Yet, the interests that profit from broadcasting seem not to have been organized to support broadcasting. The natural expedient, therefore, is to sell "air space" to advertisers.

Vanity, thy name is the advertiser of merchandise who spends his money to get his name in print, or on the radio, without expectation of business results.

SPECIAL PAGES

DO special pages pay? It is an old idea. There is a theory that advertisers brought in for an occasional use of small space because of the special interest in a page devoted to their trade specialty, often learn the value of advertising and develop good accounts.

Summer is usually a light season for music advertising, but we see an occasional music page that appears to be making money. The electric pages are ordinarily successful, sometimes running into Sunday sections in large cities.

In these days almost every newspaper carries a financial page, but outside of large cities, a small proportion show adequate advertising support, particularly local volume. Summer sport pages deserve particularly strong advertising support—they are the centers of interest for a mighty host of the livest elements in society.

EDITOR & PUBLISHER, in its valuable "Dollar Puller" department, which merits the attention of every advertising man, often presents successful experiences of many newspapers with special pages. It is a subject worthy of consideration if your summer volume is light.

Never before have we seen so many newspaper men writing for the periodical press, mainly about newspapers and newspaper men, some critically and some generally, but all helpfully.

L. C. OWEN

L. C. OWEN, Division News Editor and Special Staff writer, with headquarters at San Francisco, has been for ten years or more one of the best known newspaper men on the Pacific Coast.

A man of the "great open spaces" himself, Mr. Owen's stories breathe the atmosphere of the vast country in which he has a roving commission.

Some of the most graphic stories of the great Japanese earthquake were told first by L. C. Owen from facts gathered at the wireless stations when the world was waiting eagerly for news of the catastrophe. One of his recent dispatches was an eye-witness account of the first execution of a man in the lethal gas chamber at Reno.

San Francisco is admittedly one of the colorful cities of the world. Mr. Owen's stories reflect that color. His writings teem with human interest values. Whether it be a tale of the sea, of old Chinatown or of Nob Hill, this writer treats it with equal skill and a rare versatility.

NEWSPAPER MAKERS AT WORK

By LUCILE BRIAN GILMORE

CHARLES HENRY DENNIS—Great newspapers have great staffs.

FORTY-TWO years in one newspaper organization in almost every editorial position from cub reporter to managing editor. Builder of the first great foreign news service. Maker of newspaper men and friend of many of the most notable of them.—Author.

There you have a thumb-nail sketch of the career of Charles Henry Dennis, managing editor of the Chicago Daily News.

While Mr. Dennis has been in active charge of the foreign service of the Daily News throughout its development, he declared that it was Victor F. Lawson, publisher of the Daily News, who had the vision of the need for and possibilities of such a service.

"The Spanish-American war made the United States a world power and created in this country an interest in foreign affairs such as never before had existed," Mr. Dennis asserted.

"Our army and navy fought in foreign territory. We assumed a sort of guardianship over Cuba and acquired Porto Rico, Guam and the Philippines. We made new contracts with other nations.

"Mr. Lawson was quick to realize this new condition and to prepare to meet it. It was possible to buy news of services in foreign countries, but it was unsatisfactory. It was written from the point of view of the country from which it came. Mr. Lawson's ideal was a service which would give foreign news for American readers, presenting the American point of view. To me he assigned the task of building such a service."

Mr. Dennis believes that the present is the beginning of a new era of interest in foreign news. The interest which developed during the Spanish-American war waned somewhat afterwards. There was another lull following the World War. Now he observes the first growing interest in foreign affairs, which has not been stimulated by a war. He believes it will continue to increase and will be lasting.

He cited conferences on foreign affairs being held at colleges and universities in the United States.

"The ability to recognize and to develop good newspaper men is the greatest asset a managing editor can have," Mr. Dennis said in reply to a question.

"Some men are born newspaper men, some men never can become newspaper men no matter how hard they try. By keeping young men of ability coming into the organization all the time, encouraging them, developing them, holding them with the paper, a newspaper always can be assured of having men for every need. No newspaper can be great which has not a great staff.

"Any managing editor should have an intense interest in his city. He should know and believe in human nature. He should see that the news is presented in a sympathetic rather than a cynical manner."

Speaking of himself is exceedingly distasteful to Mr. Dennis, but he loves to tell of men with whom he has been associated. He cherishes the memory of Eugene Field, near whom he worked for many years on the Daily News. He delights to tell of Field's practical jokes, his active brain, his brilliant work. He recently completed a book about Field which soon is to come from the press of Doubleday, Page & Co.

Mr. Dennis and George Harvey were reporters together on the old Chicago Morning News. That was in the days when there were no electric lights, taxicabs or typewriters. A reporter coming into the office would get a kerosene lamp from a table back of the city editor's desk, go to his own desk and write his stories with a pencil.

Near press-time one night, according to a story Mr. Dennis tells, there was reported an explosion near what now is the stockyards district of Chicago. Harvey and Dennis were assigned to it. Going in a hack, they found the scene of the explosion. Among the excited, jabbering foreigners they could not find a person who could speak English. The two reporters spent the few minutes they had in looking over the scene and picking up such information as they could find and then started back to the office in the hack.

"On the way to the office Harvey said to me, 'Dennis, I'll be planning the story if you'll be working on a list of dead and injured,'" according to Mr. Dennis' account. "Our story stood up. The only fault that ever has been found with our work that night was that the list of dead and injured contained too many Polish names and too few Lithuanian."

Mr. Dennis declared George Harvey to be a natural reporter. He said the same thing of George Ade, once a member of the Daily News staff. John T. McCutcheon proved in his covering of the battle of Manila and subsequent stories in the Philippines that he was a real war correspondent, Mr. Dennis said. Others whom he recalled affectionately and with praise were Kennett Harris and Ray Stannard Baker.

"Well, I play a rotten game of golf occasionally," Mr. Dennis replied to a question as to his recreation.

Mr. Dennis was born at Decatur, Ill., in 1860. He became a reporter on the Daily News the day after his graduation from the University of Illinois, where he had been editor of the university paper and had done some other newspaper work. During his first ten years on the Daily News he was successively reporter, dramatic critic, editorial writer, assistant city editor, city editor and news editor. During the next nine years he was managing editor of the old Chicago Record, of which Mr. Lawson also was publisher. When Mr. Lawson sold the Record in 1901, Mr. Dennis became chief editorial writer and manager of the foreign service of the Daily News. He was associate editor from 1907 to 1912, and since 1912 has been managing editor.

Mr. Dennis is married and has a son and two daughters.

Our Own World of Letters

By JAMES MELVIN LEE

WHAT is the newspaper man's newspaper? That is a hard question to answer today. Yet when Charles Anderson Dana edited the New York Sun there was only one answer, because this title was so commonly applied to Dana's paper. Edward P. Mitchell, who is publishing his reminiscences in Scribner's Magazine, has selected it as a caption for his comments about his former chief and their newspaper. (Mitchell was connected with the Sun for 45 years.)

The anecdotes which Mr. Mitchell inserts bring back the Dana that old-timers used to know. After remarking that Dana always had pity for a nincompoop, and frequently showed a soft side for the simpleton who was honest, he gives this illustration:

> Somebody reported on a letter intended for publication: "This man's a darned fool." "Let's print it," said Dana. "Always give the darned fools a chance."

One night when Mitchell went out to the composing room to make up the editorial page he found in the form an item written by Mr. Dana and marked "Must." It was substantially as follows:

> We are indebted to our esteemed subscriber, Mr. Jabez Lightwalter of Goshen, for the largest and reddest and most mysterious apple that ever came to Manhattan. For more than one reason it is a prodigy of fruition. It looks as good as it is beautiful, but it would be a pity to cut it for eating; for it displays in perfectly distinct white letters on its unimpaired natural skin the initials of the Editor of this paper, who is compelled to confess that the marvel of cultivation or of artifice producing this phenomenon is beyond his comprehension.

Mitchell killed the item. When Dana the next morning demanded: "What became of my 'Must' paragraph about the apple?" Mitchell explained that the trick could easily be turned on an apple by pasting letters cut out of paper on the equator of the apple when it was green and then letting the sun do the rest. Dana replied: "Don't be afraid to kill my 'Must' for any reason as good as that one. Lynch him without judge or jury."

Mr. Mitchell thus introduces and describes Thomas F. Williams, who was Dana's secretary for a quarter of a century.

> He was a sworn Fenian of 1864, a Dublin scholar and journalist, good as gold and taciturn as an educated clam, with a little of Mark Twain's physiognomy and a great deal of Mark Twain's tardiloquence. Like Boyle O'Reilly, he came to this country when presence in Ireland was no longer possible. An ardent fisherman, his sailboat, the "Sand Flea," was frequently in evidence on Sundays in the lower bay. It was difficult to detect emotion in his sun-tanned countenance unless the subject was the wrongs of Erin or piscatorial conditions on the Roamer shoals. . . .
> For years there was famous in shorthand circles the story of his application for the post that became of life tenure. "Mr. Williams," inquired Mr. Dana, "are you sure you can take me as fast as I can talk?" "I don't know whether I can take you as fast as you can talk, Mr. Dana," drawled Williams, "but I do know I can take you as fast as any sensible man ought to talk."

Space—no editorial fib—permits only one more quotation, the Sun as a school of journalism:

> In the prime years of the Dana period it used to be the fashion to describe the Sun not only as "the newspaper man's newspaper," but also as "the best school of journalismm" then in existence. As to any attempt at formal instruction it was, of course, never a "school" in the sense intended. Such teaching as the beginner had was negative, rather than didactic. The editor, and those of his subordinates who were more or less wise in the ways of the profession, were too busy as a rule in getting out the paper seven days in the week to devote any time to the systematic training of their younger associates. If education there was, it was mainly education by absorption. It came to the aspiring by example rather than precept. They were taught by observation and by the self-preservative instinct what to do and what to avoid.

CARL C. DICKEY, who was formerly on the staff of the New York Times, starts, in The World's Work for September, a series of articles on "The Truth About the Newspapers."

WIL V. TUFFORD, secretary-treasurer of The Inland Daily Press Association, is the author of "In Poetic Fields" (Press of the Iowa Printing Company, Clinton, Ia.). The thing that first impresses the reader is the economy in the use of white paper. I never could see why a full page should be given up to a verse of only four lines, but this may be the thought of a practical printer and not that of a poet. Columns in this book, like those of a newspaper, have been filled—not with fillers, but with good stuff.

Possibly Mr. Tufford is at his best when he picks up the old autograph album to turn its pages over, or when he finds his old, high chair in the garret. In these, and other verses in a similar vein, he seems to live over again the past in an Indian summer by heart.

One is a little surprised at not finding more references to the newspaper. Yet this field, so dear to the author's heart, is not completely overlooked, as the following quotation will show:

> I am the modern press—
> The Daily Newspaper.
> I call on you at all hours,
> From 5 a. m. to the Bull Dog edition.
> I may say things sometimes unkind,
> But mainly I come with a smile.
> I bring good cheer;
> I bring good luck to all.
> I tell of strikes,
> And of great crops,
> Of prosperity and progress.
> I may be burlesonized,
> But I am here to stay,
> While a free people
> Live in America.
> I am the Daily Press.

DOUBLEDAY, PAGE, & CO. seem to have almost a monopoly on the humor written by newspaper men. For example, it has just published "The Old Soak's History of the World," by Don Marquis, and "The Wisdom of Laziness," by Fred C. Kelly. The former is written in the Old Soak dialect, which is so funny itself that the subject matter need not be humorous. Strictly speaking, the volume by Kelly might be more correctly described as semi-humorous as there is some good common sense thrown in by way of good measure.

MRS. RALEIGH HANSL, who as Eva von Bauer at one time so ably edited the Woman's Page of the New York Evening Sun, reviews in The Bookman for August recent books published for the information of parents.

HARRY HANSEN, literary editor of the Chicago Daily News, finds time to review in The Nation for August 6 "The Autobiography of an Idea," by Louis H. Sullivan.

WALTER PRICHARD EATON in The Bookman for August has a brief but interesting chat about three great American printers—Bruce Rogers, Frederic W. Goudy, and D. B. Updike.

FOR newspaper men the most interesting item in The Nation for Aug. 6 is "Appalling Confusion in the New York World. Editorials in the World on La Follette explains the publication of the article by The Nation.

STEPHANE LAUZANNE, who edits the Paris Matin, answers in The World's Work for August the question "Will French Women Ever Vote?"

DON C. SEITZ is scheduled to contribute to The Atlantic Monthly for September "A Portrait of an Editor—Joseph Pulitzer." This magazine article is doubtless based on material used by Mr. Seitz in the preparation of his volume, "The Life and Letters of Joseph Pulitzer."

What More Can An Advertiser Expect

If a newspaper has a paid daily circulation of 27,000 in a community where there are 110,000 people? That newspaper should have strength enough to produce excellent results for its advertisers. Most merchants in Altoona have come to the point of concentrating all their efforts in the Altoona Mirror, because of its strength as an advertising medium.

They Know From Experience

If the reader is at all skeptical regarding the pulling power of the Altoona Mirror, address a letter to any of Altoona's leading merchants. Ask them to give you their candid opinion about the results they have obtained. The publishers of Altoona's only A.B.C. newspaper are confident regarding the answers.

No newspaper covers its territory more thoroughly and there is no more prosperous city in Pennsylvania than Altoona.

"WEMBLEY MEET FIXED ADVERTISING'S PLACE IN WORLD TRADE"—HUNT

A. A. C. W. Manager Speaks Enthusiastically of Benefits of Recent Convention—Says Americans Gained An International Viewpoint

"ORGANIZED advertising has found its place in the sun."

So declared Carl Hunt, manager of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World, on his return last Saturday to this country from the 20th annual convention of the advertising clubs held in London.

CARL HUNT

In an interview granted EDITOR & PUBLISHER, Hunt enthusiastically detailed benefits from the conclave derived by the American advertising fraternity. Summing up results of the meet, he expressed conviction that he was voicing opinions of the large majority of the 1900 advertising men who crossed the Atlantic to attend the international gathering.

"A prominent British advertising man stated just before convention sessions closed that advertising had been advanced 25 years in Great Britain," Hunt recalled.

"By this he did not mean that the English were so many years behind Americans in the profession. They are not. The exchange of ideas and ideals was reciprocal.

"What he meant was that, while heretofore nations seeking to solve economic problems had looked only to bankers, lawyers, statesmen, farmers and manufacturers, overlooking the potentialities of advertising men, the makers of markets, now, because of the gathering, advertising had attained its rightful recognition in the world.

"The A. A. C. W. convention was a dramatic staging of the idea that world markets can be created by advertising, and that the creation of such markets is concomitant with prosperity.

"The idea of organized advertising has taken its place in the affairs of the world as the means for development of bigger sales and bigger commerce, with the resultant solution of economic problems."

Mr. Hunt pointed out that advertising is now helping to answer a serious economic problem in England. Demand is being created and production is subsequently increasing, with the result that unemployment and the dole to 1,500,000 unemployed people is being decreased, he said.

"Prosperity, our association believes, arises from the ability to create markets. This idea, along with the importance of marketing, was stressed at the convention."

Mr. Hunt then went on to discussion of personal business values gained by Americans attending the London meet.

"Perhaps the biggest value of this sort," he said, "was the contact established between advertising men on the boats going over and returning from England.

"Then those who were in the export business, those wishing to expand their markets overseas, were offered and accepted tremenduous opportunities.

"We went over to see London. We saw the British Empire. I refer to the Wembley Exposition, which I wish could be duplicated in this country. This exposition presented a wonderful picture of a broad market, an inspiration, a remarkable source of trade information.

"Possibly many who went to England and saw the exposition were inspired with the thought of a broader market.

"We need more export business in the United States.

"Prosperity seems within easy reach in one single unit in the United States. It is a temptation for both advertising men and manufacturers to be content with this one market. Yet those who have learned the value of creating markets in other parts of the world are insured a more even flow of prosperity.

"Many A. A. C. W. members, I am sure, obtained this impression.

"Then others went to England desiring to find out specific things. Doors were opened wide to us. Ideas were exchanged. We talked to foreigners. We learned what they were thinking about; what they wanted.

"Briefly, a host of provincial Americans were given an international point of view.

"This international character has been everlastingly imprinted upon the A. A. C. W. We realize now that we must aid more than ever before in advertising club organization all over the world.

"Large delegations have promised to come to Houston in 1925 from England and France. Our internationality will be maintained."

Mr. Hunt concluded by saying that the convention had been the "biggest and best" in the association's history, which is 20 years.

"The English," he said, "prepared a marvelous program for us. Probably the most outstanding factor, and that which we will remember longest, will be the heartiness of British reception and entertainment."

Pennsylvania City Advertising

Sunbury, Pa., merchants through the Chamber of Commerce have launched a community advertising campaign featuring the "spirit of neighborliness" as a community asset.

The friendliness, reciprocity, and spirit of helpfulness as suggested by the simple act of "borrowing a cup of sugar" from a neighbor is the keynote of the series of ten 2-column, 10-inch ads, set in 10-pt, and signed "Merchants of Sunbury."

The ads appear weekly in 10 newspapers in that section of the state which Sunbury considers its trade territory.

THE MAN-MAKER

An introduction!.....Come meet him, then—
Pounding his grinder or pushing a pen:
The Anonymous Maker of Famous Men!

Down in a corner called Pumpkinville,
In the last white house top o' the hill,
Lived an humble Farmer, grinding tools,
Plowing and dragging and cussing mules.
A Horny-Handed old type was he,
And he pitched his hay with a motion free
Till the Local Editor grabbed his pen
And called him a Prominent Citizen!

Then he hired a husky with calloused hands
To slaughter his hogs and turn his lands,
And got him a stovepipe and started to mix
In the Game of the Great called Politics.
Wherever a keg was bunged, he swung
A convincing manner and fluent tongue,
Till in course of time he arrived, and won
The Editor's brand of Favorite Son.

Out from the grasses of Pumpkinville,
Out from the white house top o' the hill,
Out from the business of grinding tools,
Plowing and dragging and cussing mules . . .
Behold, our hero has ridden his Fate
Into the halls of the Very Great! . . .
Back Home the Editor's praises burn
When he seconds a Motion to Adjourn!

Back Home the Editor shoves his pen,
Splitting Infinitives now and then—

Lay Plans for Fall Now

Churches each year are learning the advantages of spending money to take their message to the community and to attract more attendants to service.

If you had difficulty last year in putting across a church attendance campaign perhaps your effort then has resulted in acknowledgment by church authorities now that advertising can be used to advantage.

Plan now for a definite city-wide campaign to begin when churches recommence vigorous operations, usually about September 1 to 15.

New copy will be offered shortly, similar to Series No. 3 and No. 4, used by many newspapers the past year.

NEW BEDFORD DAILIES IMPROVE PLANT

Evening Standard and Morning Mercury Owned by Benjamin Anthony Occupy New 5-Story Addition—Enlarge Press Equipment

The New Bedford (Mass.) Standard and the Mercury have moved into a new 5-story addition to the Standard building. A Hoe octuple press is being installed, and from now on both the Standard and the Mercury will be published as 8-column instead of 7-column newspapers.

This is the fourth major expansion step taken by the Standard. Started 74 years ago, by Edmund Anthony, grandfather of the present publisher, the Standard grew steadily with the progress of the city, and soon moved into a large and what in those times was considered a very handsome office, located on the edge of the business section of the town. This was occupied for 36 years.

As the old quarters became too small, a beginning was made on the present Standard building, a 4-story structure of yellow brick being erected.

In 1911 this building was further enlarged, an addition being built and a fifth story added and new machinery installed, including a Hoe sextuple press, the capacities of which are now becoming inadequate. The 5-story addition just completed to give room for the octuple press increases the floor space in the building by 40 per cent.

On the first floor are located the circulation departments of both newspapers, as well as the classified advertising department and the telephone exchange. A mezzanine floor above the street floor accommodates the bookkeeping department, and affords storage for supplies and files. The mailing room, which has been completely rearranged, is located in the basement adjacent to the pressroom. It has been equipped with a Lamson conveyor to facilitate the handling of bundles of newspapers, which are distributed throughout New Bedford and its immediate vicinity by a fleet of automobile trucks, and go by train to more distant points in New England.

The advertising department, the copy writers, and business offices are located on the second floor, and here, too, is located the publisher's office. Office space occupying part of the first, second, third and fifth floors is rented, while being held in reserve for the future needs of the Standard-Mercury organization.

The third floor of the building houses the editorial staff of both the Standard and the Mercury, as well as the "gravelard" reference library and recreation room, while the photo-engraving rooms and staff photographers' rooms are on the fifth floor.

In line with its activity in community development, the Standard-Mercury has set aside from its own resources during 1924 the sum of $10,000 for advertising New Bedford throughout the country. This money is being handled through regular advertising channels in such mediums as the New York Times and the Chicago Tribune.

Benjamin H. Anthony, the present head of the organization, has grown up in the newspaper business.

The Standard-Mercury organization publishes three newspapers—the Evening Standard, the Morning Mercury, and the Sunday Standard.

Commission Cites Two Concerns for Unfair Advertising

The Federal Trade Commission has issued unfair practice citations against W. C. and W. S. Mahaffey, and K. Hendricks of Linesville, Pa., trading as Mahaffey Brothers and Hendricks for advertising special process stationery as "Process Engraved" giving the public, the Commission alleges, the misleading impression that the stationery is engraved. The process is described as an application of chemical powder to type printing while wet and then submitted to baking, as opposed to real engraving from a plate.

The Puritan Silk Mills Corporation of Chicago also has been cited by the Commission for the alleged misbranding and advertising of certain fabrics as "Novelty Silks" and "Puritan Silks" with a "tendency to deceive purchasers of such products into the erroneous belief that the products are made of silk."

NEW AND AUTHENTIC HISTORY OF THE HERALD OF THE BENNETTS

By ALBERT EVANDER COLEMAN—41 Years on the New York Herald staff

Mrs. Bennett's Interesting Letters

Mrs. Bennett wielded a facile pen, and wrote a series of letters from Europe between December, 1846, and June, 1847, that were very favorably received by the public as they appeared from time to time in the Herald.

The first one to be published was headed, "Random Notes by Mrs. James Gordon Bennett," and was written in Paris on November 18, 1846. It was almost wholly devoted to a discussion of her little son's welfare and her plans for his education and physical development, and reads as follows:

"My Dear Madam: Here we are in Paris at last, after travelling during the last summer over the greater part of Europe.

"You will be astonished when I tell you that I have not been engaged in studying the fashions, or driving in the Champs Elyssees or walking in the Tuileries. Instead of these, I have been making enquiries into the European system of education for youth. When I was in Switzerland, I learned a great deal about the new and improved methods of instructing youth, which interested me exceedingly, because my little boy, now coming of school age, requires some attention in that respect. * * * *

"I have sent my little boy to two schools—one to instruct his mind, the other to develop his body. His whole time is taken up between these institutions. The little Count de Paris attends this school, and goes through the same exercises. It is amusing to see the little creatures leap and jump about; climb ladders, turn somersets, hang by their hands, and work as hard as any posture-maker in the ring. The floor is padded in such a way that they can't hurt themselves.

"I have a great many things to say to you on other subjects, but must defer it to another time, as I am interrupted by a host of marchands de modes, who have just discovered that I am a new importation, and probably flush with money, and that they may lighten my burden with their attractive finery.

"Yours, H. A. B."

In another letter dated June 20, 1847, from Florence, Italy, Mrs. Bennett wrote as follows:

"I regret very much not having had a conversation with the Pope; but it was my own fault. I could not remain one day longer in Rome, though Monsignor Zamboni called on me himself, in company with Mr. Brown, the American consul, and tried to persuade me to remain one day longer. This M. Zamboni is a young nobleman, and one of the Pope's chamberlains. He sent me a cameo ring, with the Pope's likeness on it, and different other relics, and a painting which I bought. He does it for the benefit of the church. It is a copy of a celebrated picture by Guido."

In another letter, headed "Notes from Abroad by Mrs. James Gordon Bennett," and sent from London, she said:

"In London yet—damp, rainy London. Jenny Lind made her last appearance last night in 'Somnambula,' an opera in which she is said to excel. I must say decidedly, that she has not sufficient force for the character, in which my favorite, Grisi, is supreme. I have heard Grisi in the private salon, and there she is as fine as in the public theatre. In the concert room Jenny Lind pleases, from the extreme purity and beauty of her voice, but in the higher range of the musical drama, she lacks the sublime force of Grisi, and also Mr. B. says, of Malibran—still she is a wonder, and a peculiar wonder.

"After going the round of England, she returns to Germany. If ever she appears in Paris, there will be a prodigious controversy about the supremacy of her talents. The extreme purity and amiability of her character, so different from Grisi, who is both a termagant and a genius, has taken very much with the English nobility.

"A singular occurrence took place at a concert given at the palace by the Queen, where Grisi and Jenny Lind were to sing. It seems, Jenny, overflowing with good nature, was very desirous of an introduction to Grisi. It was given. Jenny was all smiles and amiability. Grisi received the advances with coldness, haughtiness and compulsion. As soon as the introduction was over, the beautfiul Italian turned her back to the fair Norwegian. The Queen, who was near by, witnessed this droll circumstance, and from that moment never entered Convent Garden, when Grisi performed."

Of Cerito, the famous dancer, she wrote:

"Cerito, the dancer is a lovely creature. I think the bounding leap, when she first appears on the stage, is the most wonderful and most graceful movement imaginable. You see her as if flying in the air like some ethereal being. The applause after the first movement is deafening."

Her last letter, dated August 25, 1847, was from London, and told of her last visit to Rome, where she "had the supreme pleasure of beholding that amiable and very talented man, Pius IX, the present Pope."

She also gave to her American friends advice as to the best way to tour Europe.

Mr. Bennett's letters were numerous and lengthy, and of great general interest. On June 19, 1847, he wrote:

"I have now completed my arrangements for the continent, in relation to correspondence and news, during the new regime of steam. I have established a central agency in Paris, with correspondents extending to all the chief cities in central and southern Europe. This is separate and distinct from my English arrangements. * * * * Hereafter the United States will be more closely connected with Europe than ever was contemplated by man. In two or three years there will probably be an arrival of a steamer every two days, doing the voyage in ten or twelve days. The improvements of the press must correspond with those in the other great departments of life."

In one of his last letters Mr. Bennett said: "The Queen has just sailed for the North of Scotland——Jenny Lind has gone to Brighton ——Louis Phillippe has gone to Eu—— broken down in health. He cannot live long. When he dies, then look out for squalls in France and elsewhere. The people are waking up and organizing for further decided movements all over Europe."

His final letter, dated August 31, was devoted to a description of the serious commercial crisis in England.

"The Ludlow is Paying Daily Dividends"

THE president of the Queens County News, Jamaica, New York, Mr. Eugene E. Early, writes us this short, enthusiastic letter:

"Our experience with Ludlow composition is simply this: The Ludlow has solved our composing room problems. It is paying daily dividends because it saves the most vital element in the printing and publishing business ---i. e., time. We would not be without it."

LUDLOW QUALITY COMPOSITION

DETROIT VETERAN SHUNS TYPEWRITERS — PREPARES COPY IN LONGHAND

NO novelist or scenarist, however fanciful his vagaries, has ever taxed his imaginative powers to the point of attempting to create a hero for a newspaper epic who turned out his brilliant masterpieces in longhand. The feverish and epochal efforts of the dauntless reporter of screen and printed page are always pounded into hastily-snatched takes on the keyboard of an ancient mill. Yet, while the fact may seem unbelievably remarkable to those who have not learned it, there is such a character—a star on a great daily whose copy is written, to the final dash, with a fountain pen. He is John Fitzgibbons of the Detroit News.

JOHN FITZGIBBONS

Fitzgibbons is the oldest newspaperman in point of service in Michigan. He has been with the Detroit News continuously for more than 40 years. During that time he has covered practically all political events of importance that have occurred in the state. He has known at least 15 governors intimately. He has the widest acquaintance among men of affairs of any Wolverine newspaperman.

It was in the capacity of "coachman" that Fitzgibbons started his newspaper career. He came off a farm near Flint, Mich., and obtained a place driving a high-stepping "nag" for the late James E. Scripps, founder of the News. In spare time he composed some editorial paragraphs, which he submitted to his employer one morning while taking him to the office. The publisher liked the efforts and Fitzgibbons put aside the curry-comb and took up the pen. His original assignment was to report a dental convention.

Fitzgibbons has seen service in Washington, during congressional sessions. He represented his paper in Cuba in 1898 and in the Philippines in 1900. Upon his return he was stationed regularly at the Capitol in Lansing. He has served there uninterruptedly since.

It was at Mt. Clemens, Mich., during the Chicago Tribune-Henry Ford libel case that Fitzgibbons' odd system of reporting stood him in good stead. When his copy left the courtroom it was ready for telegraphic transmission and his paper profited by the time saved. A visiting correspondent, while that trial was on, sent out a paragraph on "the longhand reporter." Within a month he was besieged with letters from no less than 10 manufacturers of fountain pens asking his indorsement of their particular make as his favorite. Thus far, however, "Fitz" has remained neutral on this point. Just as neutral, in fact, as he is determined that he will waste no efforts gaining a one-fingered intimacy with the keys of a tottery office typewriter.

Montana Daily Host at Banquet

Celebrating the sixtieth anniversary of the discovery of gold in Last Chance Gulch, now Helena, Mont., the Helena Record-Herald recently gave a banquet to pioneers of the community. Dr. O. M. Lanstrum, publisher of the Record-Herald, announced the occasion would be made an annual event. Four prospectors found nuggets at Last Chance Gulch on the evening of July 14, 1864, the news of which brought on a great rush of miners to the new camp.

N. Y. World's "Kiddie Club" Frolics

More than 12,000 members of the New York Evening World's Kiddie Club attended the annual outing held this week at Starlight Amusement Park. "Cousin Eleanor" (Miss Eleanor Schorer) foster mother of the club membership, was on hand and qualified for handshaking honors. Miss Schorer is the wife of Chester Hope, editor of Universal Service, New York.

Oklahoma Names "Bronson Year"

Driving for new members of the Oklahoma Press Association, the present year has been termed "Bronson Year" in honor of the late E. L. Bronson, editor of the El Reno (Okla.) American, who died recently. Mr. Bronson, during his life, was one of the most enthusiastic association workers. E. A. Gaston, the newly elected association president, is conducting the membership drive.

Editor Runs "Auto Honor Roll"

While most newspapers print detailed accounts of automobile accidents, the editor of the El Reno (Okla.) American takes the other slant, and each week prints in a box an automobile honor roll of people who are entitled to recognition because of their careful driving. The names are supplied by traffic officers.

Permanent Wealth Assured

IOWA

By the Elasticity of Its Products

Iowa has never known a crop failure, consequently, there is always production. Iowa's income from farm products alone is nearly a billion dollars annually.

Iowa farmers never quit. If the market drops, he cuts his overhead but keeps right on producing. He knows the elasticity of products and takes advantage of it.

His usual procedure is to sell his crops just as they come from the fields for shipment to the markets. If, however, he cannot get a good return, he sells to the mills and canning factories within the state and thus avoids the cost of long freight hauls. As a result the flour mills are doing an annual business of over $25,000,000 and the canning factories well over $6,000,000.

When prices drop, these industries are not seriously affected because the farmer must sell enough to pay his taxes and current expenses, and because of the lesser distance they offer him the best market. The farmer himself does not take such great losses. He only sells what he has to, the rest he feeds to his stock, and gets a good price for the stock. The surplus he stores until such time as buying confidence is restored.

As is usually the case, the period of depression is now being followed by a good crop year. When the farmer is prosperous, the people in the towns and cities of the state are prosperous. They are now eagerly watching their daily papers for suggestions as to improvements that are to be made.

TOLD LAWYER TO CONFESS

Hearst New York Assistant Publisher on Stand in Fallon Bribe Case

New York newspapers in general gave wide publicity this week to the testimony of Victor A. Watson, assistant publisher of New York American, in the case of William J. Fallon, lawyer, on trial charged with having bribed a juror in behalf of two bucket-shop clients. Watson testified that he had advised Fallon to confess guilt and throw himself on the mercy of the community. The testimony was a revelation of activity on the part of the newspaper to expose a system of fraud and indicated that the newspaper had paid large sums of money in the enterprise.

WHAT THEY ARE SAYING

RADIO CANNOT SUPPLANT NEWSPAPERS

"EVEN the radio with its seemingly boundless possibilities holds nothing in store for you that is comparable to the service of your newspaper. The radio is not going to tell you about the wedding of your neighbor's daughter. You won't find the radio telling you how your neighborhood baseball team knocked the daylights out of the team in the next town. A member of your own club might be entertaining friends but you wouldn't know about it if your newspaper didn't tell you. The radio isn't going to do that. The two fields are different. They say that the average metropolitan newspaper today prints about 100,000 words in each issue. If the radio should attempt to transmit that amount of reading matter estimates are that the process would take from 8 to 10 hours. Imagine yourself tuning in for that length of time to get what your daily paper brought you this morning!"—Frank Hicks, University of Iowa School of Journalism.

TRAINING NEWSPAPER READERS

"DEMOCRATIC government depends upon public opinion and public opinion, as we know today, is mainly taken from the newspaper. If the purpose of education is to train the youth of the nation in citizenship, the study of the newspaper should have a prominent part in our public schools. Newspaper reading today is not taken as a serious part of the individual's daily life. On the whole the individual devotes at least 30 minutes a day to the newspaper. This is the weakness of our modern democracy. We do not digest the facts, we swallow them too hurriedly. The aim of the newspaper and journalism schools should be to train a new generation of newspaper readers to whom news, real news, is of more importance than the society column, the sporting page or the funny strip. The news should be read first leaving these other features as dessert. The news is the solid food. We need to cultivate news taste and discrimination in the public."—W. G. Bleyer, Director, School of Journalism, University of Wisconsin.

SCRAPINGS

"I KNOW of one newspaper man who was receiving $25 for Sunday articles, and who failed to please his Sunday editor with a certain interview. It was a botch job. The editor rejected it. The newspaper man, who had to submit regularly in order to secure his main income, was delighted. He sent the piece to the editor of a weekly magazine, one which carried heavy advertising, and straightway received a check for $250 and a request for more of the same. That day the newspaper lost an intelligent, active fellow, a good writer with a talent for facts. The ex-newspaper man is now supplying more of the same, with his tongue in his cheek and a $150 tailored suit on his back. Most magazine articles read exactly for what they are: scrapings from the reporter's kettle."—Laurence Stallings in New York World.

Ninth in Industrial Products Valued at Nearly

$2,000,000,000

The industrial growth of the state is the natural result of superior transportation facilities. It is the pathway of almost all of the great trunk lines, and branch lines tap every part of the state.

Indiana's industrial value is tremendous, ranking ninth in point of value of products, with $1,901,846,000.

Manufacturing comprehends practically all standard products—steel machinery, motor cars, tinplate, cement, flour, glass, oil refining and meat packing.

Manufacturing consumes most agricultural products in preparation of foodstuffs for the market—meat packing, flour, etc., with considerable development also of machinery making to supply the immense nearby markets.

No other state enjoys the peculiar advantages of Indiana in regard to raw materials, fuel, power resources and transportation facilities. Other natural resources, especially sands and clay, furnish bases of profitable industries for her people, all of which have greatly contributed to the buying power of the people of the state.

Advertisers owe it to themselves to carefully scan the Indiana field and its great possibilities. This field can be judiciously covered by use of Indiana newspapers.

METHODS OF VALUING NEWSPAPER PROPERTY DISCUSSED BY EXPERT

Multiplying Annual Net Profits by Ten and Adding Current Assets and Plant Replacement Cost Favorite Method

By FRANK R. ELLIOTT

HOW to value a newspaper property, one of the most vital questions of the business, is one of the hardest to decide if we may judge from answers of men who have had much experience. None of the old heads in the newspaper business will lay down a hard and fast rule; they warn the purchaser to use common sense and think well over the general problems of local conditions, character of population, strength of competition, labor conditions, and responsiveness of business men. And buy low and sell high, is the rule here as elsewhere for success in commerce.

Speaking generally, the majority of the fifteen men whose answers form the basis of this article stand for three plans for valuing a newspaper property. The general methods are:

1. Count circulation and good will at $10,000 per 1,000 of paid circulation and add net current assets and plant replacement value.

2. Value circulation and good will at the total gross receipts for a year, and add net current assets and plant replacement value.

3. Value circulation at the amount of the net earnings capitalized at 10 per cent and add net assets and replacement costs of plant.

The main point of difference lies in the value of circulation and good will. The publishers questioned are divided about equally between the three methods of accomplishing this, with the first method mentioned above least favored and the last method favored slightly more than the other two.

Jason Rogers, formerly of the New York Globe, says the fairest method and the safe and sane starting point for all circulation is $10,000 per 1,000 of circulation. "Circulation as an item of the good will of a newspaper," he says, "is in most cases the newspaper's most valuable asset. Circulation once established, because of the peculiar nature of the patronage, is almost sure to continue, provided the quality of the paper is maintained the same."

After fifty years as a publisher and more than twenty years as a newspaper broker, C. M. Palmer, of New York, says $10 per subscriber is a low rather than a high rate for circulation and good will except on a losing paper. On a leading paper, $10 is decidedly low, he says.

H. F. Henrichs, veteran newspaper broker, of Litchfield, Ill., also shares the view that $10 per subscriber is low except for newspapers failing to show a normal profit.

Omar D. Gray, broker, of the Sturgeon (Mo.) Leader, says $10 per paid subscription is "outrageous" for a weekly of 1,000 circulation in a small town, but that $10 is not far wrong in a good town for a daily or weekly of 3,000 to 5,000 circulation. "The owner of a good daily or weekly," says Mr. Gray, "that will net from $5,000 to $12,000 annually can usually name his own price."

Paul Poynter, publisher of the St. Petersburg (Fla.) Times, the Kokomo (Ind.) Dispatch, and the Sullivan (Ind.) Times, voices a dissenting opinion and says that no dogmatic figure of $10,000 per 1,000 of paid circulation is safe. "Circulation," he points out, and there is food for serious thought in this, "may even be a liability unless the business community is responsive."

When such experienced and successful newspaper men as Mr. Poynter and Don C. Seitz of the New York World, rather enthusiastically endorse the second plan previously mentioned, namely that of valuing circulation and good will at gross annual receipts, there must be merit in the plan. Mr. Poynter qualifies his endorsement by recommending that the gross annual receipts be taken as the average for five years rather than the receipts for any one year.

"My rough method of valuing a newspaper property has always been," writes Mr. Seitz, "that a going concern is worth its gross annual business, plus a fair valuation of the plant."

Leonard E. Kolmer, president of the Southern Publishers Exchange, Inc., Richmond, Va., readily asserts that this is the best plan and is highly satisfactory when net assets and replacement value can be established. Mr. Gray, referred to above, agrees with this view but says that present day buyers will not usually pay this price.

As with the case of $10,000 per 1,000 of circulation, this second method of valuing circulation and good will at gross annual receipts brings a vigorously dissenting opinion. "This is a very poor rule," says Broker Henrichs, "and can be applied with justice to but a very few properties."

The third plan of valuing a newspaper at ten times its net profits for a year plus net current assets and plant replacement has unqualified support from a number of editors and brokers.

"Probably most popular rule," says Mr. Henrichs, "when net earnings make due allowance for owners' compensation, depreciation, interest on the investment, etc."

"A newspaper is actually worth ten times its annual profits," said the late General Charles H. Taylor, of the Boston Globe. He makes no provision for adding net current assets and replacement costs.

If a newspaper nets 10% on $10,000, it is honestly worth $10,000, says Justus F. Creamer, of the Orange, (Col.) News, without allowance for net current assets and plant replacement.

Editor Poynter agrees with plan three but thinks the ten percent earnings should be considered as the average earnings over a five year period. In this he may seem unduly conservative, especially in view of the growth of newspapers within the last few years, but he reminds the prospective buyer that the newspaper business carries with it a hazard and risk not present in most commercial and industrial undertakings. It is primarily more of a profession than a business, he points out, and a wave of public sentiment in a short time can destroy a great deal of imaginary value. The prudent purchaser must guard against being made the victim of forced, artificial and fraudulent methods of circulation building, but at the same time he should be on the lookout for undeveloped possibilities in the newspaper property he is about to buy.

Broker Palmer, while agreeing with the view that at least a 10% earning should be expected on the investment, warns the prospective purchaser that unprofitable papers are frequently sold for sums running into the millions.

Both more liberal and more conservative methods of valuing newspapers than those outlined above have been followed by prominent publishers of the past and are being followed to some extent in the present.

James E. Scripps, founder of the Detroit News, held that a paper was worth its annual cash receipts if making 5 per cent twice its receipts plus the value of the plant if making 10 per cent, and three times the receipts plus the plant if making 15 per cent. This would make the cost almost twice as great as that of plan two above in which a paper was held to be worth its gross annual receipts, with the assumption that 10 per cent is a fair income.

In a meeting of the Southern California Editorial Association, two plans were introduced as follows:

'1. Place weekly subscriptions at from $5 to $10, average $7.50; daily subscriptions at from $10 to $20, average $15; and add to this the plant valuation less depreciation allowance.

2. Value the plant at a reasonable figure without taking out depreciation and if the gross annual earnings amount to this figure, pay this amount for the property.

W. B. Harris, purchaser or promoter of 135 different newspaper properties during his long career in the weekly newspaper field, now editor of the Ellettsville (Ind.) Farm, places circulation value at $5 per paid subscription. O. H. Cravens, publisher of the Bloomington (Ind.) World, says $7.50 is nearer the correct valuation of circulation and would add whatever additional the good will value seems to be.

The rather conservative view of John Dodge, of the old Scripps-McCrea Syndicate, is offered by Mr. Henrichs as a rule which must be respected because of the wide experience of Mr. Dodge in purchasing and conducting newspapers. His rule is as follows:

"A going newspaper property is worth $5 per subscriber if the paper is breaking even.

"When property is making regular, healthy yearly growth and is earning be-

Connecticut Commission Dismisses Case Brought by Publisher

Advocating "a proper amount of publicity on the part of public utility companies," Chairman Higgins of the Connecticut Commission at Hartford, Conn., recently dismissed a case brought before him by Mayor Phillips of Stamford, a newspaper publisher, protesting the right of the Stamford Gas and Electric Light Company to spend money for newspaper advertising.

The defendant claimed the advertisements in question were educational in character and explained the company's system of charging for gas and electric light.

Phillips at the hearing declared against "a grasping monopoly, which does unnecessary advertising." He is publisher of the Darien (Conn.) Review, which is one of the newspapers in which the Stamford company advertises.

Following dismissal of the case, the public utility company announced it would continue its newspaper advertising campaign.

NEWS WRITERS KEEP COOL

Group Covering World Flyers Are Now in Iceland

Many newspaper men are enjoying cool weather in the vicinity of Iceland this week, writing the history of the last lap of the world flyers.

Representing the Associated Press are W. J. G. Myers, chief of the A. P. New Haven bureau, on the destroyer Barry, now transferred to the Lawrence; W. E. Playfair, of the Boston bureau, on the S. S. Richmond; S. F. Reavis, of the London office, on the cruiser Raleigh; and Laclair D. Schulze, of the London office, on the Gertude Rask, Danish government steamer carrying supplies.

For the United Press Associations are Otis Peabody Swift, on the Richmond; Bob Doorland on the Lawrence, and J. R. Kelly, Montreal bureau, at Nova Scotia.

Davis Walsh is representing the International News Service, while Damon Runyon and Charles Tietsort are up north for Universal Service.

The Chicago Tribune has sent a huge Curtiss bi-plane to meet the world flyers. It is operated by H. A. Baker of New York. Reaching Portland, Me., Aug. 4, a few minor repairs were made, and the seaplane started for St. John, N. B. and from that port plans to continue north until the army aviators are encountered.

Reichler to Edit Square and Compass

Isadore Reichler, night city editor of the Utica (N. Y.) Daily Press, resigned, effective Aug. 1, to devote all his time to Square and Compass, a Masonic periodical published jointly in Utica by himself and his brother, Samuel Reichler, attorney. Kerby M. Spicer, for 2 years state editor, succeeds Reichler, while Robert L. Wheeler will take Spicer's place on the state news desk. Reichler had been a member of the Daily Press news staff for the last 4 years.

N. Y. to Have New German Daily

The Heiss Corporation, Inc., publishers of the Inspirator, German language monthly, announced this week it would start publication of the New York Deutsche Post, first as a monthly, with a view to making it a daily German language newspaper by Jan. 1, 1925.

Lakeland Star-Telegram Expands

The Lakeland (Fla.) Star-Telegram, a morning daily, this week started publication of an evening edition. L. W. Bloom and Harry L. Brown are the editors of the Star-Telegram W. F. Merrill is the new member of the Associated Press for the new paper.

Missouri Labor Weekly Moves

Charles W. Fear, editor and publisher of the Missouri Trades Unionist, has announced that his labor weekly, published at Joplin, Mo., for the last 15 years, will move to Jefferson City, Mo.

VALUING PAPER

tween breaking even and 15 per cent, add $1 per name for each 3 per cent of profit.

"Ten dollars per name if netting 15%; for each 1 per cent profit above 15 per cent, add $2 per name up to 20 per cent profit."

Perhaps the best indication of how to value a newspaper property may be gained from a study of some newspaper sales.

The Miami (Fla.) Metropolis, of 9,000 circulation, and the Canton (O.) News, with 20,000 circulation, are reported to have sold to ex-Governor James M. Cox, of Ohio, for $350,000 and $425,000, respectively.

In the field of the larger papers, the Pittsburgh Press is said to have brought $6,000,000 on a circulation of 150,000 daily and 200,000 Sunday.

The Vancouver Daily Province similarly is said to have sold for $1,000,000 with a circulation of 62,200.

As will be seen from the advice of nearly all newspaper owners of wide experience, valuation formulas are hard to determine on account of the variable factors of history, location, competition, field, personalities, and local financial conditions. Mere circulation and good will might be worth twice as much in one paper as in another.

When viewed purely and simply from a commercial standpoint and as a money-making proposition all these variable quantities must be taken into account. The owner will be interested in the income he will receive from his investment, and the only sure way to arrive at figures on profits would seem to be to find out what the profits have been over a period of years. If the prospects then are that the profits will be no less in the future than they have been, the prospective purchaser would be justified in offering an amount which will yield the desired profit.

Mrs. Don Seitz Dies in Maine

Mrs. Mildred E. Seitz, wife of Don C. Seitz, business manager of the New York World, died at St. Barnabas Hospital, Portland, Me., Aug. 4, following an operation. She was the daughter of the late John H. Blake of East Deering, where she was born in 1861. She was married to Mr. Seitz at East Deering in 1890 and thereafter lived in Brooklyn, N. Y., where she was prominent in local affairs. She served as president of the Chiropean and Cambridge Clubs and as regent of the Long Island Chapter of the Daughters of the Revolution. She was also deeply interested in orphan children, having found good homes for about one hundred, the majority of whom came from Maine. She had been spending the summer, at Summit Spring, Harrison, Me. Besides her husband, she is survived by two daughters, Miss Mildred Seitz and Mrs. E. M. Geibel, the latter of Tientsin, China, and two brothers, F. W. Blake of Tufts College and James B. Blake of Bridgton, Me.

WHO are the real estate agents in your city? It is to every real estate man's advantage to have folks familiar with his appearance. So it would be an easy stunt to get most of the real estate men to come in on a page or double page which was given over to photos and write-ups of the local real estate men under an appropriate heading clear across the page. The size of the space which any one man could buy should be limited so that no one man could dominate the whole thing and so that every advertiser would get a fair deal out of the proposition.—Frank H. Williams, Fort Wayne, Ind.

Every Saturday a manager of a small daily in northern New England runs a half page of advertising, the space being allotted solely to those establishments who specialize in the baking of beans for Saturday customers. In this way some small home bakeries became advertisers who had never advertised previously. Thus the newspaper received revenue from an unexpected source. The newspaper manager obtained this idea from the owner of one of the small bakeries.—W. McNulty, St. John, Can.

This idea makes a hit with theatres, washing machine dealers, grocers and others. In a 3-column space, letter in the days of the week in bold letters. Then block off 7 equal spaces with the names of the days at the top of each space and a heading across the top similar to this, "THINGS OF INTEREST IN BLANKVILLE NEXT WEEK." This is a good tonic for a lean Saturday issue.—Donald O. Ross, Washington (Ia.) Democrat.

Mexico City El Universal (Spanish) runs a column entitled "What You Ought to Know," presenting many advertisements of local merchants, restaurateurs and others, written interestingly as news.—C. M. Litteljohn, Washington, D. C.

"Patronize your neighborhood theater." Under this heading you can work up a campaign to run for a considerable length of time writing large copy telling why you should patronize the "movie" in your neighborhood—easy to get to, cheaper, etc.—pro-rating cost of compaign among the theaters.—Dorothy Dickel, Cleveland.

"Mighty Lak A Rose" was the caption of a full-page co-operative recently run in a northern New York publication. The page contained 10 spaces with cuts of infants in each, and each space exploited some necessity for the little folks. It ought not be difficult to convince progressive merchants that such an advertisement would have a tremendous appeal to mothers.—George C. Marcley, Ogdensburg (N. Y.) Republican-Journal.

Buenos Aires La Nacion had a whole page ad in a recent issue in which the border outline carried the advertising, which was for a well known cigarette in that city. The interior (save for a small box of additional advertising) was utilized in interesting reading matter, a tiny short story, several paragraphs for children, illustrations, and magazine features of miniature nature. Considerable originality and enterprise was shown in this advertising endeavor, in furnishing reading material not elsewhere available. —C. M. Litteljohn, Washington, D. C.

There is a small community just outside of Portland which has no paper of its own. Once a week we publish a full page or two of news and stories of this community under a strip head. This scheme is popular with the small town's merchants and several hundreds of extra inches have been secured on regular weekly insertion contracts.—Tim Ward, Portland (Me.) Express.

Bird, of the Hackensack Republican; John J. Sweeney, past president of the club; E. A. Royal Commission Makes Report

The Royal Commission on Pulpwood has presented an exhaustive report to the Canadian Parliament, urging the development of a chain of publicly owned forests throughout the Dominion and suggesting a general conference to improve the protection of timber lands. The commission commenced investigation into the forest resources of Canada, Oct. 2, 1923. Regarding application of an export tax, the report states that such a step would be adding "insult to injury."

PEOPLE are always celebrating their wedding anniversaries. But only a small percentage of these are reported. Silver and golden ones make good copy, and furnish future morgue material. The Alexandria (Va.) Gazette is now endeavoring to have the principals send in this material by inserting the following ad in the regular classified columns of the Gazette:

WANTED: News of wedding anniversaries. Have you celebrated your silver or golden anniversary? If so, let us know. Address Society Reporter, The Gazette, or telephone No. 7.—C. M. Littlejohn, Washington, D. C.

In order to stimulate more interest in personals among its reporters one Washington state daily recently offered a bonus of $5 a week to the reporter who obtained the greatest number on his run. The results were gratifying, the average per day being raised from 50 to more than 100.—A. N.

Tennis is increasing in popularity each year. A story containing facts of various interviews with older men and their opinions of the game as compared with the sports of their day should make interesting reading for your subscribers. The improvements made to the city courts in the past few years, and the number of private courts in town should also be included in the article.—H. M., Logansport (Ind.) Pharos-Tribune.

For several years one of the pullers of a prominent mid-west daily was a little two-column box run in the lower right hand corner of page one, telling a humorous anecdote on some prominent business or professional man. Sometimes they would be illustrated with a miniature cartoon. Actual names were used, and nothing embarrassing was printed. Sometimes it would be a joke in court on a certain lawyer told by a fellow lawyer, or something that happened to a prominent business man on a trip, or something that had happened several years ago. Lots of human interest in a little feature of this kind, and good anywhere. Head it "Our Daily Yarn" or "Today's Corner Story."—E. G., Chicago.

What do purchasers of postage stamps tell the stamp clerk? Detroit News recently had an interesting feature—one that could be worked up in any city—of the many stories patrons tell as to why they are writing letters, of especial interest being the excuses many offered for placing special delivery stamps on letters.—A. N.

The Portland Sunday Telegram runs a complete section of automobile news, touring information and advertising every week. A recently inaugurated feature which is proving popular is a combination line cut and half-tone engraving showing a one day's motor tour illustrated with photographs of scenes on the trip, also a story giving information on points of beauty and historical interest. The map is marked and indexed and the photographs numbered to correspond with their position on the map.—Tim Ward, Portland (Me.) Express and Telegram.

Common mistakes of automobile drivers and how these might be avoided are being covered in a daily feature of the Boston Post. A striking illlustration brings out the point, which is discussed frankly, sometimes quoting what leading traffic officers say. The public is invited to report violations of the law to a local automobile club, which has prepared the data. The mayor has endorsed the series.—James M. Mosely, Boston, Mass.

NEW CASTLE HERALD SUSPENDS

Lack of Advertising Patronage Forces Daily to Quit

NEW CASTLE, Pa., Aug. 6.—After more than 60 years of existence the New Castle Herald has joined the Valhalla of newspapers. Saturday evening, Aug. 2, the Herald published its last edition, giving as its reason for suspension the lack of patronage by advertisers. The Herald was originally the Courant-Guardian but some 20 years ago under the management of Addison C. Dickinson changed its name. About 10 years ago the paper was taken over by H. C. Ogden, of Wheeling, W. Va., and has continued under his management ever since.

Whether or not the plant will be dismantled or sold to new interests is not known at the present time, although some of the equipment has already been moved out. Three years ago the Herald erected a new plant on East street and installed a press which had been taken from a Washington, Pa., newspaper which had suspended.

In the announcement of suspension the Herald said, "New Castle may be a one newspaper town, or it may be that the paper will do better under a different management."

The notice came as a surprise, none of the employes having been informed. The withdrawal of the Herald from the New Castle field leaves but one daily in the field, the News.

Two other dailies, the Rapid City (S. D.) Evening Journal and the Waycross (Ga.) Morning Journal-Herald suspended last week.

Omaha Examiner Suspends

The Omaha Examiner, a weekly published and edited by "Senator" Alfred Sorenson, dean of Omaha newspaper men, suspended publication with this week's issue after 21 years of continuous publication. Mr. Sorenson who has had 53 years of active newspaper work, will retire.

The Montana State Press Association is holding its annual convention at Lewiston, Mont., Thursday, Friday and Saturday this week. Warden, general manager of the Great Falls Tribune, is president of the association, and S. E. Peterson, secretary-treasurer. Elections were to be held this Saturday. Program for the meet was arranged by Peterson, G. M. Moss, P. B. Snelson, C. H. Draper, M. J. Hutchens and T. J. Hocking.

Newsprint Imports Increase

This meant that in these 6 months, American newsprint manufacturers lost business amounting to more than $5,400,000. Of the total, Germany shipped 25,994 tons; Sweden, 20,854 tons; Finland, 18,947 tons; Norway, 5,000 tons; and other European countries, 1,557 tons.

Ohio Daily Celebrates New Home

The Chillicothe (O.) News-Advertiser celebrated its centennial year and the formal opening of its new home with a special edition July 23. The newspaper traces its history back to the spring of 1824, when Caleb Atwater established the Friend of Freedom. The Chillicothe Advertiser was founded June 11, 1831. J. K. Hunter is the present president and general manager. An artistic fireproof building now houses the News-Advertiser plant, the mechanical department having a total floor area of 4,000 square feet.

Rapid Strides in National Advertising

DURING the first half of this year The Sun in New York carried 1,599,194 lines of NATIONAL ADVERTISING, a greater volume than in any similar period and a far greater volume than that carried by any other New York evening newspaper.

The Sun gained more than 300,000 lines of National Advertising to achieve this record, materially the largest gain made by any New York morning or evening newspaper.

Advertising agencies and national advertisers recognize that in The Sun they reach the largest circulation of high-class, responsive readers attained by an evening newspaper in New York—the world's greatest market.

¶ We have newsboys in Baltimore—hustling kids with voices as loud as, and with car-hopping agility equal to those of any other city.

¶ Carrier circulation is the backbone of the Sunpapers — delivery directly into the home, not by the glorified newsboy of fiction, but by exclusive carriers, supervised by members of the Sun Route Owners Association, responsible business men who can glorify themselves after working hours and pay a good tailor for the glorification.

Managing Editor Asks Readers to Report Inaccuracies in News Columns

St. Louis Star Mails to All Persons or Institutions Whose Names Appear in Its Columns a Questionnaire as to Accuracy—98 Per Cent Reply and Many Appreciate Courteous Treatment

By MARLEN PEW

THIS is the story of a managing editor who is giving to the product of his staff the acid test of approval by the persons written about in the news columns of his paper.

If there is anything wrong with the reports he is publishing, if accuracy is not conserved, if reporters are incompetent, careless or disposed to exploit individuals for the purpose of creating sensations, this managing editor wants to know it and he goes to the original sources of information, the persons written about, and asks them to check-up on the statements his men have made in print.

It is one of the most interesting and progressive local campaigns for news accuracy and editorial responsibility which has come to the attention of EDITOR & PUBLISHER.

Frank W. Taylor, Jr., the aggressive managing editor of St. Louis Star, causes to be mailed to every local individual or institution whose name has appeared in the news columns of the Star, a questionnaire covering the subject of accuracy.

A blank form is used and the item, as cut from the paper is pasted in and the list of questions asked are as follows:

"Was your name spelled correctly?

"If not, what is the correct spelling?

"Was the street address correct?

"If not, what is the correct address?

"What statements in the article are inaccurate?"

With the questionnaire is sent a personal letter from the managing editor, which reads as follows:

"The St. Louis Star is striving constantly for accuracy in reporting the news.

"It is the purpose of the Star to reduce to a minimum any misstatements of fact, misspelling of names, incorrect reports of addresses, etc.

"Will you please indicate on the enclosed blank whether the news item which is attached was accurately handled, and mail the blank to me in the enclosed stamped envelope?

"Your co-operation will enable us to set a higher standard of accuracy."

"This questionnaire was originally sent out to some Star readers four years ago," said Mr. Taylor. "We have since sent out many thousand, ninety-eight per cent of which have been answered. Every local item in the St. Louis Star in which the name of an individual or firm is mentioned, gets the questionnaire next day.

"Through this medium we have been enabled to weed out habitually inaccurate or careless members of the staff. At the same time it has served to break down the belief in the minds of thousands of citizens that a newspaper prints only what it believes to be of interest, regardless of facts.

"During the Star's nation-wide disclosures of the medical diploma mill doctors, I obtained ample first-hand evidence of why the public is justified in doubting the report in many newspapers. Harry Brundidge, our star reporter, who at great personal risk, laid bare the medical crooks, is scientifically careful in collecting and writing his facts. To have seen his accurate, first-hand reports garbled and changed to suit the fancies or whims of what certain editors and reporters regarded as the best selling news angles of the situation, was to gain additional understanding of why the public doubts the veracity of a large section of the press.

"The Star observed that its disclosures, the details of which were made available over the width and breath of the nation, were reported inaccurately and carelessly in many leading papers and in one eastern newspaper, regarded as reliable and sometimes infallible, there appeared a half-page Sunday article which was hopelessly inaccurate on the available facts. The newspaper mentioned did not strive to present the facts carelessly, but the presentation was both careless and inaccurate. To readers who did not know, but who later might come upon the true facts, the paper was guilty of having published 'newspaper stuff,' that term of opprobrium which justifiably attaches to so much that appears in print today.

"The St. Louis Star's questionnaire is not a panacea for all ills afflicting a news department. It will not prevent errors, it will not make A1 men out of Class B material, it will not bring any great number of new readers in a week or a month, but the newspaper which employs some method such as this to convince a representative proportion of the reading public day in and day out that it is honest and seriously intentioned in the matter of accuracy, will make progress and the men on that newspaper who stand under the shadows of the questionnaire will not allow their records to be blackened with preventable error. The careful and intelligent man's record stands in relief after a sufficient number of questionnaires have been returned on his work to indicate its quality.

"Many important promotions of young men in our news department have been determined through this medium for checking the Star's accuracy."

Mr. Taylor added that readers of his newspaper often commented upon the idea of a questionnaire in returning them. There was a general note of appreciation signifying that a bond of confidence has been established between newspaper and reading client.

This novel means of promoting newspaper accuracy appears to EDITOR & PUBLISHER as significant of the new trend in American journalism. Ruthless, or at least inconsiderate methods are giving way to the higher and keener science, which comprehends fair play to every individual, whether of high or low estate.

The practice, once scorned, of submitting interviews for check as to accuracy is growing among newspapermen. EDITOR & PUBLISHER itself practices it. No member of the staff of this journal believes he has a right to quote an interviewed person, particularly one who has spoken at length and without preparation on a subject, without giving that person an opportunity to see and, if need be, edit according to his final judgment the words that are to represent him before our reading public.

It is an old theory that such a practice would tend to denature an interview, but such is not our experience. Many manuscripts are unchanged, and many are improved by interlineation and addition. All submitted interviews represent the deliberate opinion or statement of the interviewed person and accuracy cannot be questioned.

Among the newspapers and very particularly among press service men, the day of fast and loose reporting, "wild-cat writing," is distinctly on the wane. Newspaper publishers are alive to the fact that reader confidence in the correctness of news reports lies at the foundation of newspaper success. We have, however, heard of no such admirable candor with the general public as that exhibited by St. Louis Star in its accuracy questionnaire.

SAYS KLAN WRECKED SAGINAW PAPER

Evening Star Suspends and Matters May Be Settled in Courts—Talk of Reviving Publication Under Another Name

On Monday the Saginaw (Mich.) Evening Star published a three-column display box on page one announcing that it would suspend publication with that issue.

The statement read:

"This announcement is made by the management after eleventh hour attempts to keep the business going have failed.

"The Saginaw Evening Star goes down with the flag of the Saginaw Valley Publishing Company at the masthead. The old Saginaw Evening Star Company members have been approached to take the business back, but decided today against assuming the management after an organized boycott, made up largely of present stockholders, had been launched against the paper.

"Nearly $40,000 in unpaid Saginaw Valley Publishing Company stock subscriptions are now due. It is probable that the Saginaw Evening Star Company will launch suit immediately against the Saginaw Valley Publishing Company for failure to fullfill the purchase contract. Suit will also probably be started to force payment of the unpaid stock subscriptions.

"The management takes this opportunity of thanking the advertisers and subscribers who have stayed by the paper through the trial and tribulations that have been plentiful in recent weeks. Credit is also due to the working force of the paper who have fought and labored for it even after its own officers deserted.

"What disposition will be made of the equipment is not known, as no information is at hand from any of the directors of the Saginaw Publishing Company."

A. K. Alderman, editor and manager of the paper, in a statement to EDITOR & PUBLISHER, declared that the paper was broken up through a local fight among members of the Ku Klux Klan.

Mr. Alderman said:

"The Saginaw Evening Star was bought by the Saginaw Valley Publishing Company from the Saginaw Evening Star Company on March 26. A certain sum was paid down and a contract signed to pay the balance in six installments. No installment was ever paid after the original payment, although some payments were made on machinery debts. Saginaw Valley Publishing Company was made up of members of the Ku Klux Klan.

"A war among Klan members in Saginaw wrecked the paper and stopped revenue from stock subscriptions.

"The Saginaw Evening Star Company was approached to take the paper back, but refused. The Saginaw Valley is still in charge. The Saginaw Evening Star Company undoubtedly will launch suit immediately. A total of $66,000 in stock was sold in the new company, and $30,000 is now due in unpaid stock subscriptions.

"A new company composed of substantial Saginaw business men is planning to take over the paper, changing the name and publication may be resumed next week."

Butte Miner Issues Survey

A general résumé of the business conditions in Montana has just been issued by the Butte (Mont.) Daily Miner. The publication, which is in the nature of a folder, designed to fit the usual filing case, contains in loose leaf form under departmental heads, useful information for the advertising agency when preparing schedules for the placement of advertising copy. The front cover is a replica in miniature of the front page of the paper. The Miner is under the management of B. E. Woolston. Benjamin & Kentnor are the foreign representatives, both east and west.

NAMES DIGNIFIED NEW MEXICO JUDGE CALLED EDITOR CARL MAGEE

Tom Sharp Reveals the Ugly Language—New Version of Magee's Hard Fight Which Earned for a Mild "Conservative" Sobriquet of "Radical"

"STAND up Carl Magee . . . stand over here . . . you lying, low-down un-American political harlot, . . . you remittance man, . . . cow thief, . . . horse thief, . . . low-down skunk, . . . lying, mangy, cowardly reprobate . . . What have you to say for yourself?"

—Words by Judge David Leahy seeking respect for his court.

"I deny that I am accorded due process of law, and I deny that this is a court."

—Editor Magee's reply to Leahy's direct question.

"For saying that I find you in contempt of court and sentence you to from three to six months in the common jail of San Miguel county."

—Judge Leahy meeting out "justice."

Seven minutes later the editor was in his cell.

* * * *

The above version of what happened in a New Mexico court to the editor of the Albuquerque State Journal is given to EDITOR & PUBLISHER on the authority of T. E. Sharp, editor El Paso Post.

In his article in EDITOR & PUBLISHER three weeks ago, Carl Magee said that Judge Leahy "called names," but he did not specify. It is well, perhaps, to have the rough stuff known to the newspaper fraternity.

Mr. Sharp recently visited the scene of the judicial riot and has the following to say of Magee:

"In physical appearance he is a tall, heavy-set blond with light blue, quizzical eyes. He seldom is caught without a smile on his lips; at the slightest provocation this expands to a chuckle. He punctuates conversation with humorous anecdotes. He is a good conversationalist and talks in modulated, even voice, except when he tries to talk and laugh at the same time, then the words run into High C.

"He looks like a successful business or professional man, which is what he is.

"Magee was a successful and comfortably wealthy corporation lawyer and oil man before he came to New Mexico for health reasons. Not an environment or source of income that tends to make a man a 'radical.' In fact, Magee generally is considered a 'regular' in his politics and a 'conservative' in his economics.

"In New Mexico Magee found himself with a lot of time on his hands and considerable money in his pocket. He looked around for an investment and bought the Albuquerque Morning Journal from A. B. Fall. That was before Teapot Dome. Fall was hard up and needed the money.

"Going about the business of printing a daily newspaper, Editor Magee stumbled on to certain political and financial conditions in New Mexico. He thought things did not look right on the surface so he dug inside; there he found some festers of graft and corruption.

> Whether to play in with the gang and keep quiet or to risk the deluge of libel suits and perhaps his life by attempting to expose the festers.

"'Watch your step and you can go to the U. S. Senate easily in a few years,' Fall told Magee after he turned over the Journal.

"Magee now was in a position to trade with the politicians. He had found the skeletons in their closets, he knew their secrets and was on to their tricks.

"Probably he could have had whatever he asked for as pay for keeping still.

"But Magee had a crazy idea that a newspaper editor owes a duty to his readers.

"He had to shoot in the dark. Often he was certain of his facts yet held no proof, so he would have to make his charge and risk the chance of a libel judgment that would put his paper out of business.

"But he had the moral and physical courage not to care if he lost his fortune while trying to fulfill his duty as an editor.

"Magee exposed wholesale graft and crookedness in public office in New Mexico. He exposed a financial hold-up ring that was bleeding New Mexico. He exposed the fact that the will of the people could count for little in that boodle-run commonwealth.

"And for doing this his enemies call him a 'radical,' a 'bolshevist.'

"Before the fight was ended, Magee had lost all of his money and was in debt besides. Yet he did not flinch. Twice the readers of his paper came to his assistance, loaning him approximately $50,000 in $100 amounts. Twice he licked the First National of Albuquerque crowd that tried to force him to the wall.

"Magee had to sell the Journal in order to protect the interest of the readers who had loaned him money.

"He paid all of his debts and had a trifle of money left over.

"Then he started a weekly which later became a daily—the State Tribune.

"He was obsessed with the opinion that man who had discovered as much as he had about corruption in New Mexico owed it as a duty to New Mexico to carry on.

"This is the 'radical' Magee.

"He had before him the history of six other editors who had tried to fight the gang. Each of the six was ordered to appear in Judge David Leahy's court at Las Vegas and within 48 hours after being ordered to appear each had been convicted and sentenced. Each of the six promptly ceased publishing a paper.

"Magee, however, thought he was fairly safe from strong-arm methods as his paper was not published in Leahy's judicial district.

"One day a sheriff walked into his office with a citation ordering him to be in court at Las Vegas, 133 miles away, to stand trial at once.

"He was charged with criminally libeling Justice Parker of the supreme bench. Justice Parker said he did not construe Magee's editorial as libeling him. That made no difference to Judge Leahy.

"Magee went to Las Vegas. He went before Judge Leahy at 9 a. m. and asked to be released on bond until he had time to prepare his case. Leahy told him no delay would be granted, that trial would start that afternoon.

"'My attorney is on the way home from Chicago, I plead for at least enough delay to permit him to arrive' said Magee.

"Leahy replied there were plenty of good attorneys in Las Vegas and that the defendant should secure one and appear at 2 p. m. that day for trial. Magee secured other attorneys and managed to stall the case along by daily motions until his own attorney, Richard Hanna returned. Meanwhile Magee wrote for his newspaper the story of the trial. Each day he wrote an article, Judge Leahy cited him for contempt of court.

"Finally Magee entered a new plea. He stood up in court and personally accused Judge Leahy of 'railroading' him. He told Judge Leahy that he was corrupt and that if he would 'be man enough' to grant a change of venue to any other judge he would prove he was corrupt. Judge Leahy preferred to try the case himself.

"For 10 days Judge Leahy heard evidence Magee entered in an effort to prove that Judge Leahy was corrupt and a crook.

"The court had admitted that the truth would be a defense. It was up to Judge Leahy to decide if the evidence Magee introduced was true.

"If he found Magee not guilty, Judge Leahy would have to admit that the evidence introduced by Magee was true. Leahy found Magee guilty and handed him a whole flock of fines and penitentiary sentences. This trial was held last year.

"Later when it looked as if Magee would have to quit the fight against corruption and for free speech because he had exhausted his money resources, the Scripps-Howard organization came to his financial assistance.

"But for two years or more, Magee had fought the fight against corruption with his own money, and lost the money.

"Yet they call him a 'radical.'

"He is a 'radical' because when he caught a crook in the act of robbery he grabbed the hand of the crook.

"As a matter of fact, in both politics and economics, Carl Magee is a blue-blood conservative."

The New Mexican daily newspaper published in Santa Fe, the capital of New Mexico, has this to say in an editorial published under the heading, "The End in Sight."

"Everybody in New Mexico is in contempt of court. In fact, Judge Leahy's court probably now enjoys the distinction of being the most contemptible one in America.

"Truculence has given way to hysteria and bull-dozery has been becoming amusing. Judge Leahy will resign. It may not be possible to put him in jail where he belongs and to which he is fond of consigning his superiors, but his disappearance from the scene will be a great blessing and sweeten the odoriferous political air of San Miguel county, like a balmy breeze from out-doors or a dozen spots of formaldehyde and remove a public nuisance from where it offends the eye of the passerby.

"The end is in sight for Judge Leahy. The effect of his retirement will be wholesome beyond doubt. Respect for courts will begin to pick up rapidly and the peace and safety of New Mexico will no longer be menaced by the curious phenomenon of the ass in the lion's skin terrorizing full grown men."

PRINT DESPITE FLOOD

Fond du Lac Dailies Issue Miniature Editions on Job Machines

Despite handicaps imposed by the most serious flood in the history of Fon du Lac, Wis., the Daily Commonwealth and the Daily Reporter, newspapers of that city, never missed an issue last week.

Press rooms of both newspapers were flooded shortly before noon Aug. 4, and until Aug. 7, the editions appeared in miniature form, printed on small job machines. The Daily Commonwealth was issued in 4 pages, measuring 7 inches by 10 inches, while the Reporter printed the same number of pages on 6 inch by 9 inch sheets.

The new Duplex 24-page press installed by the Reporter in June 1923, was under water 12 hours. Water receded during the afternoon and evening of Wednesday and by the morning of Aug. 7 two units, 8 pages, were ready to run the day's newspaper.

The Commonwealth printed in tabloid form of Monday and Tuesday. On Aug. 6, the flood had subsided sufficiently to permit use of the steam table, but not the press. The issues of Aug. 6 and 7, were published through the courtesy of the Oshkosh (Wis.) Daily Northwestern. Mats were sent to Oshkosh and the papers returned by truck.

BRILLIANT FETES MARKED A.A.C.W. PARIS VISIT

London Meant Work, Paris Play for American Delegates—Impressive Services Held at Tomb of Unknown Soldier—Receptions and Banquets Tendered

By G. LANGELAAN

(Paris Correspondent, EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

PARIS, July 31.—Delegates of the A. A. C. W. who came to Paris on July 26 had four glorious days in France which must have filled with envy those who did not make this part of what has been a wonderful trip. London meant work. But Paris meant pleasure, and the clever French people in charge of the arrangements set the note right from the start and made the delegates feel they had only to let themselves be entertained with all that grace that the French know how to put into such occasions.

Long before the first special train drew into the Gare du Nord on the evening of July 26, the reception committee in full force were waiting on the platform beneath the rows of French and American flags for the American advertising delegates. M. Paul Dupuy, with M. Léon Bailby, of L'Intransigeant, the principal evening newspaper in Paris, and M. Marcel Knecht, secretary general of Le Matin, with many other notabilities of the French Press, were present, to say nothing of a crowd of reporters, French and American. Among the latter were Mr. Raymond B. Carroll, of the Philadelphia Public Ledger; Hudson Hawley, of the Associated Press; Lorimer Hammond, of the Chicago Tribune; A. Haskell, business manager of the New York Herald-Tribune, and James R. Morrison, of the Paris edition, New York Herald.

With trains arriving at different platforms it was a little confusing getting the delegates and the reception committee to the right spot, but eventually formal presentation took place, and then the American advertising men were taken in autocars to their respective hotels, a large number of them being housed at the Hotel Continental, where a permanent information office for their use had been set up.

Next morning the delegates began the day by a visit to the tomb of the unknown French soldier beneath the famous Arc de Triomphe, at the top of the Avenue des Champs Elysees. The ceremony was intensely impressive as the visitors walked to the grave notes of Chopin's Dead March across the wide space of the Place de l'Etoile. There have been many wreaths laid up the tomb of this unknown soldier of France. Statesmen, soldiers, kings have paid their homage before the simple slab bearing the words that there an unknown soldier lies who died for France. But of all the ceremonies, except perhaps the first when the simple coffin was lowered into the ground, never has there been one more impressive and which touched the hearts of the French more than the spontaneous way in which the delegates of the A. A. C. W. all knelt around the sacred spot and, led by the Rev. James M. Kirwin, Vicar General of the Diocese of Galveston, recited the Lord's Prayer. It was a surprise to the French people to see these practical Americans, men who had made great names in the hard world of business, in simple faith kneeling beneath the Arc de Triomphe, and it won the hearts of their hosts.

After this a number of the delegates visited the American churches in Paris. At 3 p. m. autocars were waiting for them on the Place de la Concorde and took them out to Versailles, the palace of the kings of France, a building of which every detail, inside and out, was built to please the eye, surrounded by a magnificent park where on all sides gorgeous vistas spread out before the enthralled beholder. The American visitors were greeted in the Court of Honor of the palace by M. Bonnefoy-Sibour, Prefect of Seine-et-Oise, M. Saint-Mieux, Mayor of Versailles, M. Perate, Curator of the palace, and M. Petitpas, President of the Fetes Committee. M. Bonnefoy-Sibour in a charming little speech told the visitors of his pleasure in welcoming them to Versailles, and evoked the past with its record of Franco-American friendship, definitely sealed on the battlefields of the world war. M. Saint-Mieux, the Mayor, also spoke, and Mr. Fred B. Smith responded in behalf of the visitors.

Then began a visit of the famous Chateau and its wonderful grounds, the visitors going in groups through the Chateau and the park, guided by M. Peraté and his friends, explaining all the points of interest. The fountains were set to play, throwing their glittering streams high into the air against a background of masses of green trees. Dinner was served in the Grand Trianon. At the banquet M. Paul Dupuy spoke, as did Mr. Jesse N. Neal. After this the visitors were taken to the small lake known as the Basin of Neptune, where they saw a sight which they are not likely ever to forget, one of those feasts of art of which the French are masters. A firework display, such as was given in the reign of King Louis XIV, was staged, with a culminating set-piece of the flags of America and France. When the visitors reached Paris they were tired but thrilled with a wonderful day.

Tuesday began with a reception at the Hotel de Ville, the City Hall of Paris. They were welcomed in the name of the town of Paris by M. Maurice Quentin, President of the Municipal Council, and the members of the Council. Mr. Charles, Mr. Neal and Mr. James W. Brown signed the Golden Book of the Town of Paris, the book in which all famous visitors to the French capital sign their names, while a military band played the "Star-Spangled Banner" and the "Marseillaise." M. Quentin, speaking to the American delegates, said:

"You are here in a city which has always been in the forefront of the world's history. Not far from us stands a statue which perpetuates the memory of the founder of your profession, Theophraste Renaudot. He was, in fact, an initiator, and, by his character, his ingenuity and fertile brain he deserved to be American if fate had not made of him one of the most astute of Parisians."

M. Julliard, Prefect of the Seine, spoke next.

"The science of advertising," he said, "such as you conceive it, calls for high qualities, technical experience, determination and patience, which are to the honor of your corporation."

M. Raynaldy, Minister of Commerce, also addressed the visitors.

"You have become," said the Minister of Commerce, "strictly speaking the true collaborators of those engaged in industry and commerce in your country. You launch their products on the market, you spread far and wide their renown, and you really set forth their true value. If you have attained these immense results, of which you can be justly proud, it is because disdaining, repudiating, avoiding brazen and untruthful advertising, you have made yourselves the guardians of sincerity in advertising, and thereby of the dignity of your organization.

"I can assure you that this conception of a healthy, loyal advertising, desirous of attaching renown only to those products which deserve it, you will find in our newspapers, among our solicitors of advertising, our manufacturers and our merchants. At every step you will find proofs of what I say when shortly you stop before our Paris shop windows, whose sober tones so well set off the elegance and richness of the goods displayed, or later in the evening when you pass along our boulevards."

Senator Paul Dupuy thanked M. Raynaldy and the Hotel de Ville authorities for their welcome in the following terms:

"In the name of the Reception Committee of the Advertising Clubs I wish to thank you for the splendid hospitality you have today shown to our American friends, as well as for the words of welcome which you have just spoken.

"I cannot tell you how great is my pleasure to see at the present moment the advertising clubs of all the towns of the United States gathered together in the City Hall of the town of Paris.

"A few months ago, going from place to place in America, I came into contact with these organizations which have as basis and as aim the protection and development of honest and intelligent advertising.

"How wide the Atlantic seemed to me at that moment! I would have liked to have by my side then all the merchants of our capital, in order that they might be witnesses of the prodigious development which advertising, established on a basis of high ideal, can bring to commerce.

"But the wish was impossible of realization, and it seemed equally impossible that the Advertising Clubs could leave their home and some day come to France to give us the benefit of their experience and show us their methods.

"Thanks to the energy of all concerned, what seemed an impossibility is today a reality, and all the Advertising Clubs, from the Pacific to the Atlantic, are now on the banks of the Seine, ready to communicate to us their ideal.

"This word may perhaps seem to you an exaggeration, and yet it is not. There is in the United States not a single business which does not stand upon an ideal; it would have no chance to develop and grow if the public did not understand this ideal, which the public itself seeks in everything.

"Thus it is that the Telephone Company of New York takes a whole page in all the newspapers of the city, not to announce a change of tariffs or some exceptional piece of news, but just simply to make an announcement like the following: 'Good Will. Thanks to our system, six million times a day citizens by our service are put into communication with one another in direct, personal contact. What an opportunity to develop still further good will and spirit between the inhabitants of the same town!'

"A manufacturer of food for infants advertises: 'Children are our dearest possession, and their food is of capital importance for their health. We have built our factory right out in the open country, on a beautiful site, surrounded by trees and flowers. It costs us more than if our factory were in a town, but we are without smoke or smell. Can we take too many precautions for our dear little ones?'

"Advertising understood in this way humanizes commerce and industry. It is not for me to develop here American ideas on advertising, but I do know that when these same methods are fully understood and employed among us they will produce the same wonderful results. All our limitations, those that concern production as well as those that concern distribution and marketing, will cease of themselves when we no longer set a limit to our ideal.

"To gain money is in itself never an aim worthy of a great effort. It is only an excellent fruit which we gather in passing when we serve our neighbor well.

"In London the members of the Advertising Clubs have been referred to as 'modern crusaders.' They come, indeed, impelled by their faith in their methods, to bring the good word to us in Europe.

"It is not sufficiently known in France how many eminent men the American press has counted among its members during the last quarter of a century.

"Those who have been the first courageously to reject advertisements which they considered as deceiving or not measuring up to the dignity of their newspapers have pointed out the way and have laid down the basis of this code of advertising which today, thanks to the Advertising Clubs, is spreading over the world.

"It is with all my heart that in the name of the French press I salute all the delegates and bid them welcome."

M. Rénier, of the Agence Havas, also spoke, setting forth the present situation of advertising in France, followed by M. Charles Maillard, President of the Advertising Association. Mr. H. H. Charles, President of the Advertising Club of New York, made appropriate reply to M. Dupuy's speech. Then Mr. Jarvis Wood, President of the Poor Richard's Club, in the name of the Mayor of Philadelphia, presented to the President of the Municipal Council a gavel made from the red cedar beams of Liberty Hall.

Mr. James W. Brown, of EDITOR & PUBLISHER, addressed those present, telling the French how touched all were by the wonderful reception, and pointing out to his American colleagues the earnestness and sincerity of their French colleagues and enjoining them to come again to France to study and enjoy all the wonderful things they had seen during this hurried visit. Mr. Brown thanked all those concerned for the welcome and hospitality the Americans had received.

When the visit to the Hotel de Ville was over, the delegates made their way to the American Chamber of Commerce, where they were received by the President, Mr. Blyth W. Branch. Speaking at this reception M. Paul Dupuy said:

"I am happy to have the pleasure of introducing to you this very important American delegation of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World. They came to Europe to attend the annual convention of their association in London, but did not wish to return to America without having visited Paris and France.

"As soon as you heard of their coming, you suggested to me that the American Chamber of Commerce should have the pleasure of receiving them.

"The object of the members of the Advertising Clubs in coming to France was not primarily to meet their fellow countrymen, especially as their stay in this country is so very short, but this Chamber is so Parisian and the members understand so well our French methods and points of view—and also their appreciation for all that is French is so well known—that I insist that this Chamber is regarded as essentially a part of France.

"May I take advantage of my visit here to thank you, Mr. President of the Chamber of Commerce of Paris and your Parisian colleagues, for the very considerable assistance you bring every day to Franco-American understanding and to the development of commerce and industry between our countries.

"As fellow countrymen of the members of the visiting Advertising Clubs, you all know, sirs, what is the significance of these splendid organizations. Just now, at the Hotel de Ville, I recalled the important part they play in the economic development of your great country.

"I am glad that you have this opportunity to meet and know each other, and I thank the American Chamber of Commerce in Paris for their courtesy in inviting the members of the French Committee to this American fete."

In the afternoon the delegates were received at the Palace of the Elysee by M. Gaston Doumergue, President of the French Republic. They were introduced to the President by M. Paul Dupuy, who in presenting them said:

"I present to you, Mr. President, the members of the Advertising Clubs of the United States. This important delegation, which came to Europe to attend the Advertising Convention in London, did not wish to return to America without visiting France.

"We are sincerely grateful to them, as we are grateful to you, Mr. President, for having kindly interrupted your high duties in order to receive them.

"All over the United States I have seen these clubs at work, and I can assure you that they constitute essential elements of the remarkable development of American commerce and industry and, as a consequence, of the prosperity of the United States.

"They are more than this, for they are elements of education and moral inspiration. You know their device—truth, sincerity, protection of the public. That is why we welcome them today as forerunners and consider them as veritable apostles whose doctrines are all the more valuable in that they are based upon experience and success.

"I believe I am the interpreter of all in thanking you, Mr. President, for this splendid reception, of which we shall all ever keep a precious souvenir."

To this the President of the Republic replied:

"I am very glad that you had the excellent idea of coming to visit France and Paris. I know that it is a mark of friendship for our country, and this we all feel.

"I am aware of the important role played in your country and in the world by your great association, which has taken as its rules the principles of sincerity and truth common to your colleagues in France.

"I thank you for your visit, and I wish you, while among us, the most cordial welcome."

Mr. Jesse H. Neal thanked the President in behalf of his friends for his very kind reception.

Seven hundred members of the French press and delegates sat down to a dinner in the evening at the Hotel Continental organized by the Reception Committee in the honor of the visiting Americans. M. Camille Chautemps, Minister of the Interior, presided, having beside him Mr. Myron T. Herrick, the American Ambassador; M. Raynaldy, Minister of Commerce; M. Paul Dupuy, Mr. Blyth W. Branch, President of the American Chamber of Commerce, etc.

M. Chautemps, Minister of the Interior, addressed the gathering:

"I wish to emphasize the immense services that intelligent and healthy advertising, founded according to your methods on truth and probity, could render in the necessary propaganda which public authority has to undertake in favor of works of general interest. Thanks to your enlightened efforts, advertising will become more and more in every country a formidable means of action. This ought to be placed entirely at the service of public welfare and social progress.

"Our two countries have always been friends. They were friends before the birth of your great nation. We are indebted one to the other for our independence. The companions of Lafayette went to your country to help you bring forth liberty, and the descendants of Washington came to France to help us to prevent liberty from dying. This long-standing fraternity, whose source is so noble, finds itself fortified in our hearts by the community of democratic institutions and by the inspiration of a same ideal of progress, which bases the prosperity and greatness of a State on the development of justice and peace between peoples as between citizens of one country."

Ambassador Herrick, M. Jusserand, French Ambassador at Washington, and others made loudly applauded speeches.

The final day of the Paris trip began with a visit to the Agence Havas in the rue de Richelieu, where the American delegates were shown over the building and services. Then came a luncheon at the Armenonville restaurant in the Bois de Boulogne, followed by a visit to the flying grounds of Le Bourget, where many of the delegates got views of Paris from the air. M. Laurence Eynac, Under-Secretary of State, was present. The whole wound up with a wonderful gala performance at the opera.

Throughout the visit M. Marcel Knecht, Secretary General of Le Matin, was indefatigable, and no small part of the success of the reception was due to him. He was everywhere, and succeeded in making everyone feel at home. Through him Americans and French were able to understand one another perfectly, for M. Knecht translated with ease and wonderful accuracy all the speeches made.

PRESIDENTIAL NOTIFICATIONS DRAW MANY POLITICAL WRITERS

Forty-two Correspondents, "Personally Conducted" by Jim Preston, Invaded Clarksbury—Special Wire Arrangments Made

By SAM BELL

(Washington Correspondent, Editor & Pub-

WASHINGTON, Aug. 15.—The fine Italian hand of "Jim" Preston was discernible in the press arrangements for the notification exercises this week. At Clarksburg Monday night, where John W. Davis made his speech of acceptance, and at Washington, last night, when President Coolidge received his formal notification, little was left undone to expedite the work of the newspapermen.

Arrangements at Clarksburg called forth special praise. It is far easier to handle such matters in Washington. The little town in the West Virginia hills acceded to every suggestion offered by the Hon. Jim, and carried through his ideas in a fine spirit of helpfulness.

Although the hotels were so overcrowded that cots were placed end on end in every corridor, and scores of Democratic notables were obliged to seek shelter in adjacent towns, reservations were held for correspondents. They were among the elect to have baths.

The Elks Club, through its secretary, Walter Wilson, converted its assembly hall into a press room. There were typewriters and working space enough for everyone. The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, through Col. W. V. Shipley, its Washington passenger agent, put on special cars at Preston's bidding. The Western Union sent traffic chiefs from New York and Philadelphia and experienced press operators from Washington. Twenty-three through circuits were available.

With the aid of William J. Donaldson, superintendent of the House Press Gallery, Preston had the arrangements at Goff Plaza organized along the lines of the national political conventions. Two State policemen, with motorcycles, ran copy from the scene of the notification exercises to the Western Union offices on a five-minute schedule, despite the difficulties attendant on forcing passage through the crowd of 50,000 persons.

In addition to the representatives of Clarksburg, Parkersburg, Huntington, Charleston, Wheeling and other West Virginia papers, the following news associations and papers sent special correspondents to the Clarksburg exercises:

Associated Press, James L. West.

The work of correspondents at Clarksburg, as well on the Davis assignment throughout, has been aided in a very large measure by the appointment of John E. Navin, who has been designated by the Democratic National Committee as the chief publicity representative with the candidate. Mr. Nevin, a veteran Washington correspondent, gives every indication of maintaining his reporter's point of view in handling his new position, of catering to the correspondents rather than to a candidate. Such an arrangement, if carried through, will make for the most cordial relations between Mr. Davis and the score or more of reporters who will accompany him, and will give to the candidate the best possible relations with the American reading public.

The arrangements for the Coolidge notification were handled by the Republican National Committee, through Leo Nixon. Every newspaper having a correspondent in Washington was invited to have a representative in Continental Memorial Hall, where the President delivered his acceptance address. The correspondents were placed just to the right of the speaker. It was not possible to have writing tables in the hall.

ON-TO-HOUSTON DRIVE STARTED BY CORNELL

Associate Publisher, Houston Chronicle, Says British Delegation of 500 Assured—"Key Men" Named to Promote Meet Abroad

How the "On-to-Houston" drive was launched in London immediately following the international A. A. C. W. convention there last month was told Editor & Publisher in New York this week, by R. H. Cornell, associate publisher of the Houston (Tex.) Chronicle just returned from England.

"We are already assured that a delegation of 500 advertising men from Britain and 100 from the Continent will attend the 1925 A. A. C. W. meet in Houston next July," Cornell declared.

First steps to this end were taken in London just before Cornell sailed on the home trip.

A luncheon, attended by prominent British advertising men, was staged by the Houston delegations, and plans laid for the British delegation's trip to Texas. This luncheon was arranged by Cornell for the Houston Advertising Club with the assistance of Jack Akerman, advertisement manager of the London Times, and former manager of the London bureau of the United Press Associations.

Spirit at this luncheon, which was jestingly referred to as given by "the survivors of British hospitality," plainly demonstrated that the Houston gathering would in every way be as international as the London convention just concluded.

"We sold Houston to them," he declared. "British advertising men have already started preliminary work of organization, looking towards a big representation in Texas."

Sir Charles Higham, speaking at the luncheon, praised Houston as a city "symbolic of youth," and expressed the hope that the British delegation would charter the Mauretania to cary them direct from Southampton to Houston.

Captain William Lea, Mayor of Orange, Tex., and Robert I. Cohen, of Houston, also spoke at the luncheon.

Among those attending were: Viscount Burnham, Sir Woodman Burbidge, Sir Charles Higham, H. Gordon Selfridge, Judge H. M. Garwood of Houston, W. S. Crawford, H. S. Imber, Percy Bradshaw, H. C. Derwent, Thomas McDougal and A. H. Williams.

Prior to the luncheon, Cornell made preliminary arrangements for international representation at Houston. He appointed "key men" to organize delegations from among advertising men attending the London meet. These "key men" were appointed to boost the "On-to-Houston" movement at Paris, Vienna, in Holland, Sweden, Finland, Denmark, and Cape Town, South Africa.

Mr. Cornell also described the post convention tour to Yorkshire of which he was chairman. He characterized it as by far the most interesting trip out of London following the business sessions.

Cornell plans to return to England in February to attend the convention of the 14th District of the A.A.C.W., when he will complete the "On-to-Houston" plans.

"GOOD WILL" STRESSED IN RADIO ADVERTISING

But It Works Best Tied with Newspaper Space—Dallas Man Says Radio Firms Slighting Dailies—Dissemination of Radio News Discussed

By WARREN BASSETT

"A BRAND new medium for selling people in the mass."

That is what officials of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company say of radio advertising after more than a year's experience with commercial broadcasting from their own station, WEAF.

But they shy at the phrase, "radio advertising," for that connotes trade marks, sales punch, price marks and all the other devices used in printed publicity to induce the public to buy a definite article manufactured by a definite company.

Radio advertising isn't like that. It differs radically from all printed forms. It is advertising in the second dimension. Heretofore sales appeals have been made almost exclusively through the eye—in newspapers, show windows, circulars, and on billboards. Radio advertising assails the mind of the prospect through the ear.

Advertising by radio came into existence at the beginning of the radio boom. Broadcasting stations were springing up like mushrooms. The public clamored for radio sets. Large firms with extensive budgets for advertising applied to the A. T. & T. for broadcasting apparatus that they might set up and operate their own stations. Many such stations were built and put in operation—so many in fact that other firms, contemplating such a step, saw the saturation point had been reached. With broadcasting stations on every store roof, the novelty of radio would soon wear off—the air would be filled with a meaningless babel of sound.

As proof that the above situation existed, the A. T. & T. states that more than 150 companies were contemplating the erection of broadcasting stations a year and a half ago.

The solution of the problem was what has now come to be known as radio advertising—the use of a single station by any number of firms broadcasting their own individual entertainment features, with the firm name attached.

The A. T. & T., through its station, WEAF, early began exploring and charting the field of commercial broadcasting. Today it has developed a definite technique for broadcasting publicity and has 4 salesmen in the field selling "space on the air."

It was early decided that direct advertising could not be broadcast without arousing the resentment of the radio public. A strict policy was therefore adopted, prohibiting the mention of trademarked articles, prices, or places where articles could be purchased. Only entertainment or service could be broadcast. The "Happiness Boys"—well known radio entertainers in the employ of the Happiness Candy Stores—"do their stuff" without so much as mentioning Happiness Candy. The advertising note is struck only when the name of the stores is announced before and after their appearance.

This "name" or "good will" advertising brings a high price. For a 10-minute talk on life insurance or any other subject, the company sponsoring the talk pays WEAF the sum of $200. A musical entertainment, "by courtesy of the ——— Company," is allowed a half hour's time for the same price. In addition the performers must be paid. In the case of a high-class orchestra this adds another $200 to the cost of the advertising. Approximately $400 is spent to have the firm name announced to the broadcasting public twice.

What is the value of this form of advertising?

It "humanizes" the company's general advertising in newspapers and periodicals and creates a vast amount of good will in the minds of the radio public, WEAF officials declare. They are convinced that a radio listener after enjoying the Astor Coffee Orchestra week after week, will purchase Astor coffee in preference to another brand in case the purchaser has no fixed buying habit.

The case of a face lotion was cited to show the value of radio as an advertising medium. The originator of the lotion, a woman, gave a beauty talk over WEAF—a general discussion, which made no mention of any particular cosmetic. The firm name was announced, as usual, before and after the talk. The next day WEAF received more than 100 letters, asking, "Where can I buy ———'s Face Lotion?"

A point stressed by WEAF is that to get the maximum return from radio publicity, newspaper advertising should be used simultaneously. The radio program gives the humanizing touch—creates good will—the newspaper space gives the price, place of purchase and sales appeal. Radio officials call attention to the numerous advertisements appearing in New York newspapers carrying the line, "Listen In On WEAF Tonight," to show how the two mediums are being used in conjunction.

Because of this tie-up with newspaper space, and because of the strict rules which prohibit direct advertising over radio, WEAF scouts the idea that "air copy" is a menace to newspaper advertising.

"People who criticize commercial broadcasting don't understand it," radio officials declare. "Any argument against it can be used just as effectively against other mediums.

"It is commonly said that radio advertising is forced upon the listeners. That is erroneous. It is just as easy to tune it out as it is to escape printed advertising by turning the page. Every talk is labeled advertising at the beginning and end."

It is admitted that radio is not an advertising medium suited for the small, virtually unknown firm struggling to create a market. Radio is super-publicity, institutional advertising, and works best for firms already strongly established which wish to keep their names, rather than the fine points of their products, before the public. Substantiation of this is seen in the list of companies using radio advertising—American Chicle Company, Columbia Phonograph Company, Atlantic and Pacific Tea Company, Proctor and Gamble, Borden & Co., Gold Dust Corporation—powerful corporations with prestige built on years of printed advertising.

WEAF talks space on the air to prospects on the basis of 500,000 "circulation," or listeners. That is the minimum. Maximum estimates figure the radio public in the metropolitan area at more than 2,000,000. Only firms which WEAF considers can "profitably" use radio publicity are solicited.

Response of the audience is judged by letters received at the station daily. They come from every state in the union. A card index is kept of letter writers. This index contains more than 100,000 names, it is stated. Letters to advertisers are addressed to WEAF and forwarded to the respective firms.

The comment of the advertising department of the Happiness Stores is representative.

"We are enthusiastic about radio publicity," an official said. "We think it is keeping our name before the public in a nice way. We have received more than 1,000 letters from listeners, thanking us for our program.

"I do not think, however, that radio advertising has any selling value under present conditions. It is primarily a good-will medium. Personally I think some of the advertising broadcast is very dull. Success with radio advertising depends on how you use the medium, just as it does in any other type. We have been fortunate in retaining the Happiness Boys. They have unquestionably made a hit with the public. Our use of radio has had no effect upon our use of the newspapers. At present we are using neither medium, but expect to resume in September. We believe radio in general works better as a tie-up with newspaper advertising."

Use of radio as an advertising medium is increasing, according to reports. Static, which interfered greatly with clear reception last year, is gradually being overcome by the refinement of both broadcasting and receiving instruments.

SOS calls from ships at sea often suddenly terminate a "radio ad." The air is immediately "cleared." When this occurs a free 're-run" is given the advertiser.

SONGS OF THE CRAFT

THE PIONEER

I sing a song . . . a little song
Of one of noble birth
Who plucked his vision from a Star
And brought it down to Earth.

A Prince he was—Not of the blood,
But of the heart,—who came
To lift a peasant from his knees
And show a King his shame.

Unread but in the truths that lie
In conscience, so he stood
To champion as he might the cause
Of human brotherhood.

Not they who sat in marble halls
Broke bread with him . . . he ate
His crust where he was welcome, and Quarreled never with the plate.

And I shall speak no empty speech
Of foolish phrases framed,
Nor offer gauds and baubles to
A spirit so untamed;

And I shall weave no garlands . . nay,
He would not have it so!
His strength was not in fawning friend,
But in a beaten foe.

O Spirit of the Press! . . This song,
This tribute now I bring!
I lay it at your feet, O Prince,
This feeble little thing!

But grant me grace, that in my time
I, too, may see afar
And leaping from the Earth, may pluck
My vision from a Star!

Says Manufacturers Are Slighting Press as Selling Medium

By J. P. DEWEY

Publicity Director, Dallas (Tex.) News

A GOOD many things are happening to radio as a science, perhaps as many more are happening to it as a business, while as a field of newspaper activity a number of things of prime significance are occurring. Probably the most significant of them is the fact that the gentle pastime of radio broadcasting is losing its popularity among newspapers, that only half as many papers are now operating stations as were doing so a year and a half ago, and that of the 50 papers now broadcasting a good percentage are closing their stations during the summer months.

Another significant fact is that few newspapers are venturing into radio nowadays, and most significant of all, perhaps is the fact that the number of papers which operate stations that are owned and at least partly financed by other interests seems to be increasing. The latter tendency may point the way to a solution of the problem which is, or at least should be, vexing the whole radio industry today.

Radio, an infantile industry which is struggling along to the tune of more than $350,000,000 a year, is dependent upon broadcasting as no other industry on earth is dependent upon any single supply or service factor, and yet to date it is the newspapers that are doing most of the high-grade broadcasting.

This article is not concerned directly with the fate of the radio trade, neither is it intended to deal with the question of whether broadcasting belongs within the sphere of newspaper service. It is acutely concerned with what is happening, and going to happen, among the broad and progressive newspapers which have invested thousands upon thousands of dollars in radio stations as adjuncts to their service to their people, and which are at present carrying on that service without adequate or just reward.

The responsibility for the existing condition, which is certainly not growing any better, lies in just one place and that is upon the doorstep of the big radio manufacturers, the firms that are profiting in fullest measure from newspaper broadcasting and most of whom are not displaying an agate line's worth of appreciation. Into the trade journals, class magazines and general magazines the radio folks are shoveling their advertising appropriations in vast clusters while the broadcasting newspapers seek their solace in "good will."

Broadcasting service alone is not a sound basis upon which to solicit advertising. No intelligent advertising manager would waste his time doing so. But along with broadcasting go a number of related circumstances which unquestionably stamp the broadcasting newspapers as logical media for national radio campaigns. The broadcasting newspaper is inevitably the center of radio interest in its field. It prints its programs in its own columns and nearly always supports them with a good radio department or page. It employs men who must know radio and who can talk and write it ably. Its knowledge of local conditions gives it a value in the eyes of its readers that cannot be attained by any national medium, and in radio the local conditions are vital factors.

The retailers and wholesalers in any community will be found to appreciate these facts fully. A recent investigation among them in one district developed the fact that they are unanimous in advocating the broadcasting newspapers as media for the advertising of their manufacturers. It is in spite of their wishes, or in ignorance of them, that the manufacturers are using the magazines and trade journals.

Nobody but the manufacturers themselves can tell all of their reasons for their general policy. It is safe to say, however, that one of the greatest is that they are still working primarily to establish jobber and dealer connections, that they are short-sightedly striving to load the retailers' shelves rather than to help unload them; that in short they are indulging the popular but expensive pastime of pursuing "dealer influence." If such is the case the manufacturers may be succeeding in influencing new dealers but they are missing the bull's eye with the dealers who are already on the job and who know where their patronage is coming from.

Some manufacturers are making their dealers allowances for advertising which is being handled locally; some are beginning to recognize the claims of the broadcasting newspapers and are placing campaigns with them; but there is entirely too much patronage being diverted to other channels and it is time the broadcasting newspapers had a few hats in the ring. A number of them have of course made vigorous bids individually with varying success but what the situation seems to call for is a general movement toward giving the manufacturers a clearer understanding of their claims and qualifications. There is a good-sized job open for an association of broadcasting newspapers, and if such an association can be organized and can accomplish its purpose a lot of benefits will accrue to the papers, a stronger situation will be brought about within the radio trade, and the public at large will be assured of continued high-grade newspaper broadcasting—than which no more comprehensive system of broadcasting is likely to be devised for some time.

REVERENTLY AT THE TOMB OF AN UNKNOWN HERO

American advertising men knelt at the tomb of the unknown French soldier, in Paris, while the Bishop of Galverstone prayed.

How Broadcasters Give Radio News to Daily Press

RADIO news has become a necessity to the up-to-date newspaper. The important broadcasting stations supply a good proportion of the radio sections through publicity departments. In fact, the radio editor's mail bag is becoming one of the largest in the newspaper office.

Three kinds of radio publicity material are in circulation:

1. Broadcasting programs and schedules.
2. Program news and publicity.
3. Releases of a technical nature.

As closer cooperation with the newspapers has developed, the broadcasting stations have gradually been sending out more accurate programs in a form best suited to newspaper use. But there is still frequent discrepancy between programs printed in the newspapers and those actually broadcast. This is a matter of no little importance, according to letters received by broadcasting stations from radio listeners complaining that their time schedule has not been closely followed or that a certain newspaper did not publish notice of a very enjoyable program feature. In some cases, the broadcasting station is responsible for the error. But in most instances, conditions beyond the control of the broadcasting management make changes in the program subsequent to its issuance to the press quite unavoidable. Inasmuch as some broadcasting stations supply as many as 500 and 600 newspapers with their releases, they are not in a position to issue statements of correction except through the mails. This is often too late to include final changes.

Conscientious radio editors make an effort to check up the program of the three or four principal stations in the immediate locality in which the newspaper is published just prior to going to press. In fact, one New York paper is now featuring the program changes which they obtain by last minute check up in a special box, in order to draw attention to the accuracy of their programs. Such a check-up involves considerable hard work on the part of the already over burdened radio editor but it is certainly appreciated by newspaper readers.

Most broadcasting stations have two kinds of program releases, daily and weekly. The daily release issued from 7 to 10 days in advance giving programs in considerable detail, including names of selections, etc., and weekly program is for the use of weekly newspapers and is issued two weeks or more ahead.

Radio editors are also furnished with publicity statements issued by a large number of stations. Those which obtain the widest attention are issued with considerable regard as to the accuracy of statements published in them. Publicity men in the radio field at first made the mistake of describing at least two or three artists each week as "the world's greatest broadcasting artist" or "the greatest figure who has ever appeared before the microphone" and similar exaggerated designations. The publicity statements issued by broadcasting stations should be considered as a real news service to radio editors and should consist of statements of fact. Strenuous hyperbolies simply discredit the station issuing them and ultimately their statements are not accepted as authentic.

Another feature of the successful radio publicity statement is short items featuring the human interest element, which serves as a pleasant contrast to the usual dry and technical radio page.

Human interest stories created by the imagination of a versatile publicity man for the purpose of securing publicity, however, soon expose themselves and cause radio editors to avoid future stories from the same source.

Broadcasting stations supply photographs of broadcasting artists for the use of radio editors. In one respect the radio editor is occasionally unfair in his selection of the most suitable photographs, assuming that reader interest centers on the faces of pretty women. The radio audiences entertainment in no way depends upon the features of the artist hidden behind the invisible microphone. If the performance of an artist delights them, they are interested in seeing his or her photograph, but usually the photograph of a pretty woman, whether she is a first-class artist or not, is selected for publication by radio editors in preference to that of a great violinist or singer.

The announcers, who enter hundreds of thousands of homes daily via the radio route, are regarded with a peculiar interest by the radio audience. Judging from letters I have seen, they become almost one of the family. Consequently human interest stories regarding announcers and entertainers who appear frequently are particularly appreciated by radio editors.

Another type of radio story, which has received but little attention up to this time is one which takes the reader behind the scenes of the broadcasting station. How broadcasting is done; the men who operate the stations; little incidents of the studio and the technical problems involved in placement of artists and providing wire facilities at out side points—all these things are of general interest to the radio reader.

The publicity issued by Station WEAF now has a circulation of well over 500 copies. Its form has gradually been evolved with a view to making it as useful as possible service to radio editors. Press agent work has been avoided and its descriptions of artists has been confined to terse and accurate descriptions of their careers when the artist is considered worthy of such a description. As a result, the statement has gradually earned a good reputation among editors and it is freely used. The value of this reputation evidences itself by the liberal use which is made of it.

Honor Joseph Pulitzer

Students in journalism at the Pulitzer School have just issued "The Columbia Journalist—1924." This volume is dedicated to the memory of Joseph Pulitzer, the founder of the school, and the students plan to publish a similar book each year so that this and the succeeding volumes may form a series of milestones to mark the progress of the school in training young men and women for newspaper work.

The stories printed in the volume were chosen to represent the work of the students in writing five types of articles: news stories, feature stories, editorials, criticisms, and short stories.

COVERING SCIENTISTS' MEET HUGE TASK

Advance Work on Complex Toronto Speeches Began Last December—170 Advance Articles Furnished Newspapers by Mail

TORONTO, Aug. 12.—A noteworthy feat in the covering of a great scientific convention was achieved in connection with the 92nd annual meeting in Toronto of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, to which learned savants from all parts of the world were attracted. The program presented during the 8 days of the meeting, August 6 to 13, was appalling in its extent and complexity, 13 sections holdings meetings practically simultaneously and addresses being delivered by hundreds of scientific experts on a tremendous range of topics. To give such an event adequate consideration in the press was a problem of unusual difficulty, yet, judged by the published results, remarkable success attended the effort.

As far back as last December, a publicity committee under the chairmanship of Professor Hardolph Wasteneys, associate professor of bio-chemistry in the University of Toronto, was formed and with the active assistance of a Canadian Press staff man, set to work to obtain advance material. Every expected speaker for the big gathering—there were between two and three hundred on the program—was canvassed well in advance and most of them "came across" with the text of their speeches or summaries in sufficient time to enable the publicity committee to prepare readable condensations.

The outcome was this—170 separate hold-for-release articles, approximating more than 150,000 words of copy, were mailed in advance to the newspaper members of the Canadian Press and to the Associated Press in New York for distribution to its members in the United States. This constituted practically a 75 per cent covering of a big assignment by advance mail service and undoubtedly gave the British Association the best publicity it ever received at home or abroad. For days during the progress of the meeting, the newspapers of Canada and the United States displayed many columns of the matter delivered to them some time previously, some papers publishing whole pages day after day, while the public followed with interest.

Each of the 4 Toronto dailies had from 6 to 10 men on the job and British Association proceedings dominated the news columns throughout the convention.

Never before has a science meeting been so thoroughly reported.

BUICK'S NATIONAL TEASER CAMPAIGN LURED 500,000 TO SHOW-ROOMS

Between 350 and 400 Newspapers Used to Announce New Model—Copy Ignored Mechanical Details—Made Prospects "See It for Themselves"

By HAMMOND EDWARD FRANKLIN

ANDY GUMP went fishin' in Old Timer's Lake, where no fish had been caught for some years.

He arrived back with an exceptional "string" and Old Timer asked what bait he used to make such a catch. Andy replied: "I figured out what kind of bait I would bite on if I were a fish, and used that."

Making newspaper advertising sell goods requires exactly Andy's kind of strategy. Experience has taught Buick this.

People like to have their curiosity aroused. They like to play games. Things that are "different" get a reaction more quickly than a plain, unvarnished message.

More than half a million prospects for cars are estimated to have been brought into Buick show-rooms the country over as the result of a unique and far-reaching "teaser" advertising campaign in which between 350 and 400 newspapers figured recently.

The Buick Motor Company had a new model to place before the public. To simply have announced that a new model was ready would have produced very little enthusiasm. The public would have taken it all as a matter of course and the chances are sales of the new model would not have been anything to shout about.

So it was determined to "tease" the public, to get people gossiping and wondering what was coming, and then to coax them into the show-room to actually see the new car.

The branch managers and distributors were called into session in May. The plan was unfolded to them. It was emphasized that the success of the project would depend upon absolute secrecy. As a result, while the public was wondering "what Buick was up to," nobody in Buick organizations had anything to say.

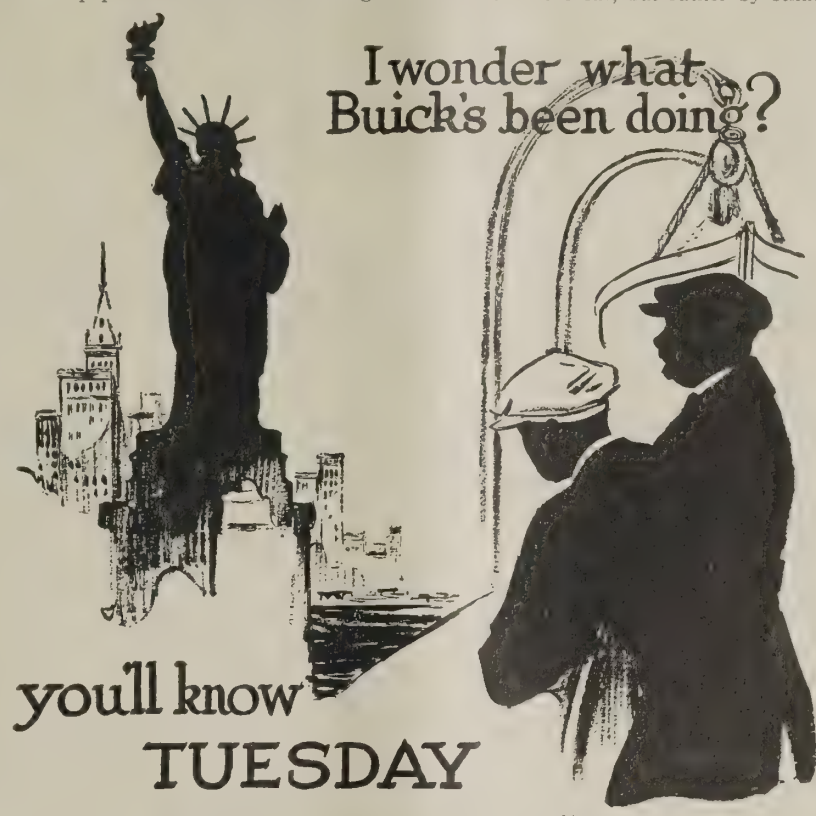
On Saturday, June 28, through the country four different advertisements ran on different pages of the same issue of the various newspapers used. Black silhouetted figures mused out loud their curiosity as to what Buick had been doing.

Two travelers coming into New York harbor, a woman receiving a letter from the postman, a sign painter on a wall, and an imitation news article all sounded the query, "What is Buick going to do? You'll know Tuesday!"

The same day a poster, "What is this rumor about a new Buick?" went up in Buick show-rooms.

On Sunday, June 29, five more teaser advertisements tickled the curiosity of the American public. "I understand Buick is going to have a new car," two men on a golf links remarked. A cowboy pausing for a moment asked a passing motorist, "What's this I hear about a 'new' Buick?" Dad asked Mother, "What is all this about a 'new' Buick?" Two men in the washroom of a Pullman asked each other, "What's this rumor concerning Buick's new car?" And a semi news story in display space was headed "Mystery surrounds Buick's new move."

To all queries, each advertisement gave the answer, "You'll know Tuesday."



Four more teaser advertisements ran on Monday, June 30. "When can I see the new Buick?" was the burden of the question. "You'll know Tuesday" was the invariable answer echoing back through the radio and otherwise in the pieces of copy. Rumors flew everywhere.

Then on Tuesday, the featured day, large space announced: "Today is the Tuesday. BUICK, It's a new six! See it for yourself."

At the same time on July 1, a poster reading, "The new Buick six is a wonder," went up in show-rooms. Three other posters also went up.

For the month of July in branch, distributor and dealer cities, outdoor postings in strong black and white silhouettes also teased the public. As the several days around July 4 were a general holiday, newspaper advertising was resumed on Tuesday, July 8. It told of the large number who responded to the advertisement on the opening day. On July 9, four advertisements appeared in one issue of each paper on the list. These again showed silhouetted figures. This time they were saying, "You must see it yourself." The emphasis was put upon actually going to see the new model.

On Thursday, July 10, four more advertisements were published.

These told very little about the car, but rather stirred interest to see it and implied there was something unusually worth looking at.

The advertising was placed by Campbell-Ewald Company, Detroit.

"The leading newspapers were used in 34 branch house and distributor cities, these being the main marketing points over the country," A. B. Batterson, advertising director of the Buick Motor Company, Detroit, explained. "Buick dealers in a number of other large cities likewise co-operated by running the entire campaign. All in all, I should say between 350 and 400 newspapers carried this advertising. Preferred position was not purchased in any paper.

"For a good many years the Buick Motor Company, in common with other automobile concerns, announced its new models to the public by taking larger space in national media and in the newspapers upon the day when these new models were first shown to the public. As time went on and such announcements became more frequent, public interest in them died down to a considerable extent. It came to us, therefore, that some thought should be given to building up the interest of the public in a new car before it came into view. Careful study revealed the fact there was no better way than arousing the curiosity of the public as to just what the new car or the new plans of the Buick Motor Company were."

Three years ago the first teaser campaign was tried out, centering attention on "What is going to happen August 1?" As a result more people crowded Buick show-rooms than ever before, not only on August 1, but for 30 days after. Later advertisements purposely did not answer all questions in the public's mind.

In 1923, the slogan was "August 1 is Buick Day." On Aug. 1, more than 225,000 people walked into Buick display rooms and within 30 days more than a million had done so. This year the new model was to be brought a month earlier and just before the Independence Day vacation period when many are away.

"You will note that Buick's announcement campaigns during the past three years have been remarkable in that they have told very little about the product itself." Mr. Batterson pointed out. "There are two very good reasons for this. First, we felt that in not telling them about the car, but rather by stimulating their interest in it, we would get them to come into the showrooms and actually see the car, and we all know what it means to have a prospect see, feel, and sit in a fine automobile. In the past we found, when everything was told in the copy, many went over the specifications carefully and decided it wasn't the car they wanted—and they didn't go to see it. Second, bringing people into the show-room enables the salesman to get the names of the prospects."

The general advertising and reputation of Buick of course form an essential background for the success of the effort. Mr. Batterson stated the company feels that newspaper advertising is of great value. While it has been impossible to get full returns, at a most conservative estimate more than 500,000 people visited Buick show-rooms on the Tuesday dramatized as a red-letter day by the newspaper teaser work. Many more have paid visits since.

ADMEN'S 'SPOON STORY' DENIED BY DUPUY

French Publisher Cables A. A. C. W. President that News Dispatch Charges Were False—Nothing Missing at Elysee

Senator Paul Dupuy, owner and publisher of the Paris Petit Parisien, this week branded as "absolutely false," news dispatches widely circulated in this country, charging that 24 gold spoons were missing following the visit of members of the A. A. C. W. to the Elysee Palace recently.

Delegates to the A. A. C. W. international convention, Wembley, were invited to attend a post-convention program in Paris, largely arranged by Senator Dupuy. One function was a banquet given by President Doumergue of France at the Elysee Palace. A few days later Paris newspapers printed stories to the effect that the advertising men, as incurable souvenir hunters, had made away with 24 gold spoons.

The French government denied the charge, but the French newspaper stories were copied extensively in this country, and Lou Holland, A. A. C. W. president, cabled Senator Dupuy for exact information.

Mr. Holland's inquiry was: "Is story true gold spoons missing after the visit of American advertisers?"

Senator Dupuy replied: "Story of missing spoons absolutely false and childish. President Doumergue just told me how he was charmed with all your delegates and how he appreciated their splendid behavior and tact. I confirm with pleasure the publicity concerning the excellent impression produced in France by this visit."

Senator Dupuy was chairman of a committee, representing statesmen and business men of France, to extend an official welcome to the American advertising men who visited France after the world convention.

24 HOUR FIELD PASSES

Cleveland Dailies Agree to Resume Day and Night Basis

From a 24-hour field to a day and night field again is the plan of Cleveland newspapers beginning Sept. 1. On that date the Plain Dealer will discontinue its bulldog edition, which goes to press at 8.45. Its first edition will be the present "All-Ohio" edition, which goes to press at 10.45. However, this will be for mail only and no Plain Dealers will be offered for sale in Cleveland until midnight.

The Press and News are to continue their early morning editions, which go to press at 7. These will be printed for mail purposes, but will not go on the streets. The first street editions of the afternoons will be at 9 a. m. The Press and News have agreed to place no editions on the streets after 5 p. m.

The first edition of the Times, which goes to press at 10.40, will remain unchanged, but it will be a mail edition only.

Would Legislate Ad Fund

To produce a revenue of $75,000 annually for publicity for the State of Maine, a bill is being drawn by a member of the last Maine legislature for presentation to the next session for a mill tax. The amount raised from this tax of one mill would be expended for advertising and publicity, in addition to the $25,000 which is raised each year by the Maine Publicity Bureau.

NEW AND AUTHENTIC HISTORY OF THE HERALD OF THE BENNETTS

By ALBERT EVANDER COLEMAN—41 Years on the New York Herald staff

CHAPTER SEVENTEEN

Mr. Bennett Returns from Europe and Instals New Hoe Presses—Herald's Enterprise During Mexican War—The Astor Place Riot—Mr. Bennett Assaulted by Graham Brothers—Trip to Cuba

ON Sept. 24, 1847, the Herald announced that Mr. Bennett's return from Europe had been delayed, "in consequence of a sudden and dangerous attack of illness in his family on the morning of the departure of the steamship 'Britannia.'" He and his family finally arrived in Boston on the steamship "Cambria" on Oct. 19.

During his prolonged absence, the steady growth of the Herald in both circulation and advertising patronage had necessitated the enlargement of his plant, and his first action after his return was to contract with, the even then famous firm of Hoe & Co., in Grand street, for two new revolving presses and an improved steam engine, at a total cost of $30,000. In a double leaded editorial, Mr. Bennett said:

"The necessity of this large expenditure has been forced on us by the increasing patronage of the public, both in the shape of advertising and in our circulation. So great has been the accession to both of these departments, that for some time past we have been under the necessity of absolutely refusing new advertisements and new subscribers, in consequence of our inability to afford space for the one, or numbers to the other. By our new arrangement we will be enabled to issue a double sheeted Herald, every morning if necessary, at the rate of from twenty to twenty-five thousand single, or ten to twelve thousand double, of full impressions per hour."

He then drew a contrast between the inadequate printing facilities of the London and Paris newspapers and those of the Herald, declaring that the publishers in the European cities had met with no success in obtaining increased speed and power.

"We have also in contemplation," said he, "to issue impressions, which are called in Paris, feuilletons, or supplements, devoted to literary and philosophical subjects. This will enable us to call into action a portion of the floating genius of this metropolis and of this country."

He also paid a high tribute to Morse and Hoe, as two of the greatest inventors of the age.

The increased facilities were brought into operation on March 12, 1849, when Mr. Bennett announced the issue of the "first Double sheet of the Herald," in which advertisements were inserted at "fifty per cent less in price than those which we publish in the inside of the single sheet." At this time the paper was 22 inches by 32 in size, and was nearly as big as the "blanket sheets" of the antiquated "Wall Street press."

On April 7, 1849, Mr. Bennett briefly summarized the Herald's splendid equipment both editorially and mechanically complete to meet all requirements:

"The Herald establishment is now in a state of the best possible organization, both as respects its intellectual and mechanical means and capabilities. Our numerous corps of editors and reporters is composed of gentlemen experienced in the useful discharge of their duties. The machinery, presses, and all necessary means and appliances are as perfect as modern art can make them. We have every facility for the publication of an immense edition in the shortest time. All this efficient organization has involved a vast outlay of money, and been the result of great experience and practical skill.

"Without the slightest inclination to depreciate the merits of any other journal in the country, we are, we believe, fully justified in stating that no other newspaper in the United States enjoys a circulation at once so large and so diffusive as the Herald.

"We shall next week commence printing our journal in entirely new and beautiful fonts of type, from the foundry of James Conner & Son."

Herald's Enterprise During the Mexican War

Mr. Bennett's ability as an organizer of efficient service was notably manifested during the Mexican War. The seat of hostilities was located at such a long distance from New York, and the invasion of Mexico took place so unexpectedly that he at first had to depend on regimental correspondents for the news, but shortly sent two prominent Southern journalists to join General Scott's army, and at great expense received, generally in advance of his contemporaries, the fullest and most accurate reports of military operations, embellished with many pictures and maps. The Herald thus more than ever before, achieved a national reputation, distancing all its competitors both in speedy news gathering, and in judicious editorial comments. Reports of many of the battles were obtained by its correspondents ahead of the official despatches and formed a part of the Government's records, while its lists of the killed and wounded were complete and were copied by newspapers all over the country.

On Nov. 14, 1847, the Herald thus editorially referred to the war's termination:

"Thus has terminated in 18 months the conquest of a great Republic, exhibiting to the world, a series of brilliant achievements, surpassing those of Napoleon in Italy; for instead of one Napoleon, ours was an army of Napoleons, and General Scott has distinguished himself in an extraordinary degree."

Some jealous publishers in May, 1849, circulated the report that the newly invented Hoe presses destroyed much paper when being operated. This Mr. Bennett denounced as "an unmitigated falsehood," concluding his denial by stating that the Herald establishment was then "complete in all its parts—mechanical and intellectual," and representing an investment of $90,000.

On April 10, 1849, Mr. Bennett could not resist the temptation to again hold up Col. Webb to ridicule. Webb was eager to obtain the Madrid mission or some other diplomatic post, and in a long editorial the Herald referred to his "furious assault on President Taylor's Administration. For the love of the Gods, gentlemen of the Cabinet, do get rid of Mr. Webb as soon as possible. Give him whatever he wants without a moment's delay. If you do not, he will puff you to ruin!"

The Astor Place Opera House riot on May 10, 1849, due to an embittered controversy between the partisans of the two famous actors, Forrest and Macready, and in which 25 people were killed and sixty wounded, led to prolonged discussions as to who was responsible for the inception of the troubles. As late as Oct. 1, 1849, Noah in the Sunday Times, tried to place the blame upon Mr. Bennett, saying:

"The quarrel of the two actors was but the occasion of the riot; we trace the bloodshed of that awful night to the simple, well known fact, that the manager of the Opera House had seen fit to refuse a season seat to the editor of the Herald!" Mr. Bennett in denying the atrocious charge, said that he had "paid his way like any other quiet citizen, at the door. The editor of the Herald was not on the spot during the riot; never saw it and knew nothing of its details." He then placed the blame for the "massacre" on Captain Rynders and his associates.

In connection with this terrible tragedy, it later became known that unscrupulous methods had been used to influence the Herald, as an article had been sent to it for publication, with which was enclosed $100 as a bribe. Mr. Bennett through the Mayor of the city, promptly turned the money over to the Protestant and Catholic Orphan Asylums, while the article was thrown into the waste basket.

Mr. Bennett kept a close watch over the doings of his contemporary editors, and on May 30, 1849 gave Mr. Greeley another casual slap, saying:

"Our amiable neighbor, and genuine friend of humanity, Massa Greeley, of the Tribune, has been edifying his readers by an elaborate narrative of his adventures on the road to Cincinnati, whither he had journeyed, in order to attend a gathering of philosophers. The Tribune's philosopher encountered all sorts of terrible disasters—such as getting wet to the skin, and going to bed without any supper—all of which romantic incidents he details with a prolixity and naivete quite characteristic and infinitely amusing. Massa Greeley was awfully shocked by the naughty expressions with which sundry stage drivers on the route interlarded their agreeable conversation, and the use of tobacco and whiskey by many of his fellow travelers, inflicted innumerable wounds upon his pure and suffering spirit."

When Greeley arrived in Cincinnati he found that the cholera epidemic had scared away his fellow philosophers, and he was sadly returning.

Later on under the heading of "Meanness of Certain Newspapers," Mr. Bennett bitterly denounced "a certain class of journals who steal and appropriate every item of intelligence that may appear exclusively in the Herald; not only without giving us any credit, but they abuse us at the same time. The Commercial Advertiser and the Daily Express, both ricketty, declining sheets of another age, are the principal offenders in this way. Even the Journal of Commerce, generally manly in its demeanor, can't resist the malarial and vicious atmosphere of Wall Street in this respect."

Convincing Figures

The figures show very conclusively that Washington is a busy market during the summer. Its physical and commercial conditions are peculiarly contributory to year-round stability. "Business as Usual" is the summer slogan in Washington—and the Star, as always, the preference of advertisers in Washington.

FOWLER SEES DANGER TO ADVERTISING IN OVER-SIZED PUBLICATIONS

Time to Think of Raising Rates to Limit Paid Spaces, Says Colgate Advertising Manager—Through Questioning of Service Values Improvements May Be Made

By GEORGE S. FOWLER

Advertising Manager of Colgate & Company

EDITOR & PUBLISHER courteously asks the writer to discuss the ten questions which our friend, Arthur Brisbane recently so capably treated in these columns. The questions give rise to some points which deserve consideration, particularly the question of how advertising is going to meet the burden that is going to be placed on it this year of our Lord 1924.

We have come to a half-year point with business conditions quite tentative, the rumblings of investigation committees still disturbing business as a whole and an unusually lengthy gathering of a national party still the subject of lunch table conversations. Moreover, with the presidential election being used as an excuse for less than good business, we must all be concerned with what our dollars are going to bring forth before the end of this year.

Mr. George Roberts of the National City Company once said the most prosperous time for this country is when it is neither looking for a boom nor fearing a disaster. That would seem to the writer to be a proper condition of mind at the present time.

About the time of the panic of '97, a pessimist of that day asked Uncle Joe Cannon what he thought of the United States, and it is reported, whether on good authority or not we cannot say, that the distinguished Congressman thought the United States was "a hell of a success."

Whatever our individual opinions of the present business situation, it is certain that the basic conditions of the country are sound and ought to offer good business for a national manufacturer who has the courage of his convictions. In most localities, the retail trade is in a fairly healthy state. While advertising, in line with other efforts of manufacturers, might be reduced at this point or that, it is not to be doubted that publishers and those who control other advertising media than magazines and newspapers will find that this year ends with their statements in a black rather than a red ink condition.

There is no need of being a Pollyanna at this time to set forth the view that with goods of merit and a courageous, continuous course of selling and advertising, most business should come through 1924 in a better state than the first quarter indicated would be the case.

EDITOR & PUBLISHER asks among other questions whether the real power of advertising is today used or understood in general by either the sellers or users of space. To the writer, that seems an unnecessary question. We all, in a measure, appreciate the need for telling the story of the goods we have to sell. Boiled down to its simplest terms, that is what advertising is, that is what advertising does.

"Are there radical improvisions in methods and in what direction do they lie?" To us who are buying advertising, it seems that sometimes there are not radical improvements which are at the same time sound policies. Better a plan which is tried and true and used over a long period of time than a policy of fly-by-night cleverness which, possibly unsuccessful at the start, turns aside a manufacturer who has taken up advertising on a wrong basis.

A radical improvement in the mind of the buyer of advertising would be the giving up of any thought that advertising is like the electric lights in our homes, to be switched on at will, and the giving up on the part of the publisher of certain policies which look to the cutting into the value of each advertising dollar to such an extent that profitable business may not be possible.

Which brings us to a reconsideration of this question: "Why is the newspaper the leading advertising medium in America?" Of course the editor would like a quick affirmative of the fact which the question implies. That, the writer at least, is not prepared to give. If it is slightly revised to read, "Why is the newspaper one of the leading advertising media?" then the fact could be affirmed and the quick and friendly suggestion might be added that the newspaper can increase its position of importance and help the advertisers and consequently put itself in a better position to become even more of a newspaper, by making sure that the advertiser's dollar is returned to him many fold, and that there shall not be so great a diversification of interest that the newspaper advertising fails of achieving its purpose for the advertiser. If the advertisement does not pay, the newspaper will not continue to increase its advertising revenue. If its advertising revenue be not increased, it presumably cannot realize its potential as an important newspaper, since money is essential to making for a newspaper of importance, and the danger in the eyes of some advertisers is a most serious one today, when we see newspapers of not forty or fifty pages, but newspapers of sixty, eighty and even one hundred pages.

It may be said quickly that some magazines are lying under the same charge, but if the question is asked in the newspaper field, as it surely is, then newspapers may well think of raising their rates so as to keep down the amount of advertising, of placing a limit to the size space advertising which will be accepted, or of the consideration of an absolute relationship between the amount of advertising that is carried in any issue and the amount of news and editorial matter in that issue.

One has only to hear this criticism coming from laymen who do not know advertising and who are becoming appalled by the amount of it, to believe that we must be most careful that we do not strike a friendly dagger in the goose and break the golden eggs even before they have been laid.

In reading the other day a most interesting book by Bruce Barton, one quotation that he used from Boswell, concerning Boswell's Johnson, was to the effect that we must all keep our friends in a constant state of repair. Surely this is an admonition to every manufacturer who has begun to make friends for his goods, both by the use of the goods and by the exploiting of them through advertising. Nothing could serve a manufacturer to a greater extent than this great economic force of advertising, in keeping his business friendships in a constant state of repair.

Recognizing that newspapers are one of the leading advertising vehicles, we must recognize, too, that the correlation of the advertisers' work and the local retail dealers' work has become a matter of great study on the part of the newspaper and a very worth while study. Begun by some few newspapers with trepidation and undoubtedly a selfish reason in the main, the merchandising service which newspapers, large and small, are rendering the advertiser and his dealers today is proving itself not only a valuable adjunct to newspaper advertising, but a creator of more newspaper advertising and an asset in making newspaper advertising more profitable.

Since discontent is the first law of advertising, we who are in the business of making advertising more respected, more useful, more profitable, should be sure from time to time that we are discontented with ourselves and our products and through that discontent will come to a point of greater service.

NEWSPAPER MAKERS AT WORK

By PHILIP SCHUYLER

FRANK G. HUNTRESS—"All newspaper publishers should work for the future."

"I CAN become prosperous as proprietor of a peanut stand, if I advertise properly," a newspaper maker once told me.

It was Frank G. Huntress, general manager of the San Antonio Express and the San Antonio Evening News, and president of the Express Publishing Company.

I considered the remark significant, because it showed the Huntress confidence in both himself and advertising, a factor largely responsible for the successful upbuilding of his two Texas properties. He went on to explain his statement.

"As a peanut stand proprietor, I would let as many as possible prospective customers know by way of a widely circulated medium that I would be at a certain street corner at a certain hour each night. There I would promise to furnish them with 'fresh, hot, roasted peanuts.'

"But to succeed, I would have to make certain that every single night my peanuts were fresh, were hot, and were roasted. I would have to deliver the goods."

Mr. Huntress has spent more than 40 of his 53 years in newspaper work, but, during the conversation, he frankly admitted that journalism is not his favorite vocation, that he always wanted to be an advertising man.

"Advertising is one of the greatest forces in this country," he believes. "It creates a desire to buy, which stimulates production; and, as in the case of the successful peanut vendor, it keeps producers up to scratch in fulfilling all they promise."

And so Mr. Huntress has become the advertisers' firm ally in the conduct of his newspapers, without slighting his readers, without creating dailies which are nothing but cash register ringers.

His newspapers were among the first in the southwest to establish a merchandising department. This was in 1913. A trip through southwest Texas was financed by the Express and News to obtain data regarding the market for advertisers.

The department does not attempt to sell goods and refuses free "write-ups." Its purpose is to educate stores to the advantages accruing from handling advertised goods.

Huntress successfully manages to keep his news columns free from publicity puffs by publishing monthly the Express-News Retailer. This paper, sold for 25 cents a year, contains all the write-ups necessary, and, according to Huntress, is well received by the local merchants.

"All newspaper publishers should work for the future of advertising," Huntress declared. "And, above all, they should work to increase public confidence in advertising. To this end they must and are generally eliminating all advertising that is not honest."

"For the 'Peepul'" smacks so often of insincerity! Soap box orators yowl the phrase to passers-by. Clownish politicians use it as a funny slapper to push voters to the polls.

But when Huntress says his newspapers "stand for the community and for its people first," one knowing him, has every reason to believe he means it, every word, and puts it into practice.

"A newspaper," he says, "should be like an individual, should have a character distinctly its own. And that character should be the composite of its readers, not its makers, whose business it is to know and believe in the people.

"I have confidence in the people of San Antonio and in taking a stand, I always try to consider the wishes of my 180 000 readers."

It is an expensive business running a newspaper for the people, Mr. Huntress, with a host of others, realizes. Retrenchments run rampant in newspaper offices.

"But you can't make cuts in the editorial department," Huntress asserts, "not if you are running a newspaper. The public wants the news, and the only way to give it to them is to pay for it."

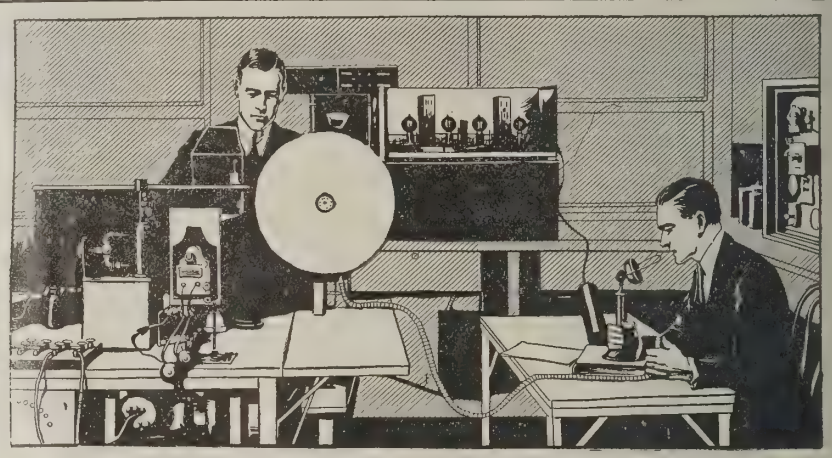
Confidence in oneself is preached often, but lived particularly well by Huntress of San Antonio.

He was a newsboy back in 1884; a newsboy, unlike the majority of that motley crew, so aptly referred to as the "power of the press." He had confidence in himself.

"It isn't how much you get, it is what are you going to make of yourself" was the idea he followed.

Like others of the paper peddlers, he advanced to the mail room of the San Antonio Express. There he spent two years. Confident he had it in him to advance higher, he resigned from head of the mail room to begin at the bottom in the circulation side. He was ambitious he was made circulation manager at the then extravagant salary of $35 a week. While a circulator, he published a suburban sport newspaper called the Pastimes on a press worked by foot and inked by hand.

Then he decided his future was not on the circulation side. He was ambitious to advance further, and saw the higher executive positions opened up from the main business office. Consequently he accepted a loss in salary to accept a collector's job for the Express at $10 a week. In the business office he advanced to bookkeeper, cashier and assistant business manager successively.



In 1889 he was made advertising manager. After that he began slowly to acquire stock in the Express Publishing Company. By December, 1910, he was elected vice-president of the concern, and in the next year attained his present position of president.

He has succeeded by having confidence in advertising, in other people, and in himself. And, added to that confidence, he has completed the cycle, by delivering the goods.

John Cohen, son of Maj. John Sanford Cohen, editor of the Atlanta Journal, was married to Miss Margaret Fox Aug. 4. Mr. Cohen is a member of the editorial staff of the New York Sun. Mr. and Mrs. Cohen are now in Europe on their honeymoon.

Cohen's associates on the Sun editorial staff presented him with a handsome clock.

The service of knowledge

The youthful Alexander Graham Bell, in 1875, was explaining one of his experiments to the American scientist, Joseph Henry. He expressed the belief that he did not have the necessary electrical knowledge to develop it.

"Get it," was the laconic advice.

During this search for knowledge came the discovery that was to be of such incalculable value to mankind.

The search for knowledge in whatever field it might lie has made possible America's supremacy in the art of the telephone.

Many times, in making a national telephone service a reality, this centralized search for knowledge has overcome engineering difficulties and removed scientific limitations that threatened to hamper the development of speech transmission. It is still making available for all the Bell companies inventions and improvements in every type of telephone mechanism.

This service of the parent company to its associates, as well as the advice and assistance given in operating, financial and legal matters, enables each company in the Bell System to render a telephone service infinitely cheaper and better than it could as an unrelated local unit.

This service of the parent company has saved hundreds of millions of dollars in first cost of Bell System telephone plant and tens of millions in annual operating expense—of which the public is enjoying the benefits.

NEW DAILY PLANNED FOR NORTH CAROLINA

John Temple Graves Will Edit Hendersonville Times Purchased by Leroy Sargent, Florida Capitalist— Was Semi-Weekly

Leroy Sargent, Florida capitalist, has purchased the Hendersonville (N. C.) Western North Carolina Times, a semi-weekly, and will begin shortly to publish it as a daily. John Temple Graves, former editor of the New York American, will edit the new newspaper.

The publication will be known as the Hendersonville Daily Times, and will be run as nearly along the lines of a metropolitan daily as its limitations will permit.

An announcement issued by the new management states:

"The Hendersonville Times will be an independent Democratic paper, as far as national and state politics are concerned. Locally it will stand for honest, efficient and clean government, no matter what party may be in power."

Mr. Sargent has engaged Morris A. Bealle of Washington, D. C., as his managing editor. Bealle was one time day city editor of the Washington Herald. More recently he has been engaged in publicity work in Virginia and North Carolina.

Graves, who will be editor, is nationally known as a newspaper man. Graduated from the University of Georgia, class of '75, his first newspaper work of importance was as editor of the Jacksonville (Fla.) Daily Union, which position he held from 1881 to 1883. Then he was associated successively with the Atlanta (Ga.) Daily Journal, and the Rome (Ga.) Tribune.

From 1905 until 1907 he was editor-in-chief and co-proprietor of the Atlanta (Ga.) Georgian. For the following 8 years he was editor of the New York American, and later was editorial representative for the Hearst newspapers. He was elected president of the New York Press Club in 1913.

In addition to his work in journalism, Graves has also taken part in Southern politics. In 1905 he was candidate for United States Senator from Georgia, but withdrew his candidacy on account of ill health. Three years later he was the candidate of the National Independence Party for Vice-President.

Coming to Hendersonville to recuperate from an operation, Graves is said to have decided to live there permanently.

E. W. and John Ewbank were editors of the semi-weekly which Mr. Sargent purchased.

Wood Newspaper Machinery Corporation,
New York City.

Gentlemen:

The Pony Autoplate Machine was installed July 20. We find that it casts a good plate in every way, and is a machine that does everything that is claimed for it, and does it well.

During its first week's operation the Pony has turned out a variety of work, in addition to the routine runs of our two daily publications, such as double-page casts, four-color comic section, and plates for our farm publication—the Farmer-Stockman.

After noting the above, it seems unnecessary to add that we are highly pleased with the new machine.

Very truly yours,

The Oklahoma Publishing Co.

EDITORIAL

IS EVERYTHING OKEH?

HAVE you the most enterprising newspaper in your city—alive to the interests of the bulk of the citizenship, and scooping the opposition on the big local and telegraph stories and giving a good ten per cent of pure, wholesome entertainment?

Will your paper show a profit gain this year, over last? Is the circulation department co-operating to keep the unpaid and left-over copies under 1 per cent of the total run?

Is your total newsprint waste, including returns and free copies, less than five per cent?

Will your daily circulation rates average two-thirds of the wholesale price, if three cents, or one half of the retail price if two cents? Will your Sunday circulation rates average better than 7 cents, if the retail price is ten cents?

Are you averaging better than a quarter of a cent per line for each thousand of circulation for display and classified advertising, both daily and Sunday?

Is it costing you less than $2 per column for advertising and around $1.65 for news composition?

Do you collect 96 per cent of your circulation accounts and 98 per cent of your advertising accounts?

Are there no bad "overhead leaks"?

Have you tied up the best features?

Are your service contracts in good shape?

Is your newsprint contract at better than $3.65?

Are you promoting your business by advertising?

Is your staff happy and contented and sharing decently with you in the profits of your enterprise?

Are you giving real, checkable, dependable service to both reader and advertiser?

All right, if such is the case, you may take a couple of weeks vacation, for your newspaper property is in good shape.

The young man who can sell and also write advertising has an advantage, comparable to that of the lawyer who can both prepare and argue a brief.

PICTURE ETHICS

THE Berlin Chamber Court recently decided that a newspaper has no right to print a person's picture contrary to his will. The case grew out of the action of a local Berlin newspaper in publishing a cut of Herr Siegfried Jacobson, who objected to the publicity and brought suit.

The question has often been raised in this country, but no rule has been set up, except as custom has dictated it among newspaper editors. To the lay mind it may appear to be a delicate and many sided problem. It is best considered, however, in the light of the general disposition of editorial men toward news subjects. It is not the object of the newspaper to disregard the legitimate sensibilities of any individual, nor act unjustly toward any person. There are numerous valid reasons why certain news figures should be pictured, even as they are written about. If the general public is not in some true sense served by the publication of a picture it ordinarily will not be printed.

The news picture is the best possible description of a person or an event in the news, and this form of reporting is advancing with tremendous rapidity throughout the world. A good picture tells the story at a glance. To some people it may seem like an invasion of private rights to be "snapped" on the street, and pictured before the world without consent, or sometimes even without notification. Normally, this is a narrow view. We are in the world and are subject to its inspection. News pictures are a part of the realism of every day life and are as legitimate in news columns as is free writing. People who are unfortunate in personal appearance often object to picture publicity and their wishes are respected. Pictures of deformed persons, or persons shown in distressing circumstances, rarely appear, except when such publication is believed to be a genuine service to the public, as in the case of criminals. No laws need be written in this country on this subject, for the voluntary attitude of editorial men in general well protects the public.

Deliver us from the narrow zealot who regards his business as a divine cause and every rival as the devil's apostle.

I CORINTHIANS
CHAPTER 1. 27-29.

But God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise; and God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things that are mighty;

And base things of the world, and things which are despised, hath God chosen, yea, and things which are not, to bring to nought things that are:

That no flesh should glory in His presence.

Does newspaper work build knowledge and sap intelligence?

NEW LABOR IDEA

THE agreement reached this week among the three union press services and their telegraphers is a notable achievement in at least one respect. The desirability of a three-year agreement, stabilizing that industry, finally became apparent to both sides. The problem was to write a safe contract for both employer and employe which would anticipate possible unforeseeable future developments which might disjoint equity.

The union was willing to take a two-year contract, but balked at three years.

It was decided in conference that the contract might be reopened at the end of two years, providing the Secretary of Labor, if appealed to, assented to the proposition that a "major economic dislocation," or an "abnormal economic situation" had occurred, rendering the contract inequitable to either party.

This is something new in labor contracts. It seems sound and practical. For the press services and their many hundreds of newspaper clients it means that there will not be the usual ugly threats of strike and preparations to meet a strike and long-drawn out negotiations each July, unless some upheaval like a war should throw business out of joint, and to the men it means three years of undisturbed work with encouraging increased pay.

"The live wire editor is the one that reads these ideas and adopts the ones that will fit his community," comments the Sooner State Press, official organ of the Oklahoma Press Association, referring to the EDITOR & PUBLISHER "Hunch" department.

WHOLESALE PSYCHING

A GIRL graduate at Columbia University prepared a 103-item questionnaire on delicate matters of personal honor, sex emotion and deep-seated "complexes" common to many people, and sent 2,000 copies to Columbia students to find the basis for a paper which she hoped would bring her a Ph.D. degree.

Columbia students, acting as newspaper correspondents, sent the story broadcast and the young lady got a very uncomfortable armful of clippings about her insolent venture. She said: "I am disgusted. We asked the newspapers not to publish the questionnaire, and urged the university publicity representative to prevent its publication, but both efforts failed. I am disgusted." It was true that New York editors were appealed to but refused to suppress the facts.

Here are three of the young lady's questions, intended to disclose psychoses in her fellow students: "Have you often stolen things?" "Do you pick your teeth in public?" "Are you one of those who think it all right to indulge in any amount of petting?"

The amateur psychologist is one of this day's worst pests. He gets a few primary thoughts on the subject and straightway proceeds to "psyche" everyone in sight. At a glance he knows to what degree you are suffering from "inferiority complex," your dreams reveal the hidden truths concerning your nature, and your sub-conscious self becomes an open book to the self-appointed analyst through an inadvertent wink of your left eye or the slant of your off shoulder when in repose.

It is well enough for the newspapers to turn the tables on these brash experiments in a delicate new science which those who have intelligently studied it admit is so intricate and incompletely developed as still to be regarded as in the laboratory stage even among the highest skilled psychologists. Any amateur trifling with it is merely playing with fire. No one with good sense or ordinary discriminating taste would ask strangers such intimate and absurd questions as those propounded by the Columbia student, most of which can be answered by most people with a "yes" and a "no," and therefore signify nothing.

The way to establish a newspaper as a radio medium, a real-estate medium, an amusement medium, or any other special medium, is to gain through hard and intelligent plugging a reputation as the local authority on that subject.

NAILING A FAKE

THE story in a French newspaper that some of the spoons used at a state banquet given in honor of the advertising convention delegates in Paris had been carried off by the American diners as souvenirs, is now denied.

The falsehood of the "lost spoons," which, of course could be nothing less than the own particular treasures of Louis XIV and therefore of incalcuable value, has found its way through a section of the American press and has fastened an insult upon the American advertising men which no amount of second-day "correcting" can remove.

Some French journalist, inspired by the noble sentiment of speeding the parting guest with a kick, invented the spoons fake and it was duly cabled and published here. The New York World calls it a "good joke." We fail to see the humor.

American correspondents in France who get their news by clipping the French press might, at least in such doubtful and such insulting instances, credit the source so that readers here could accept the "news" with proper reservations. No treasured spoons were stolen from the banquet hall by American advertising men or their wives. All that happened was that a foul-minded French newspaper man perpetrated a cheap fraud which some weak-minded American correspondents swallowed, hook, line and sinker.

A great all-season's sport: Catching a wild idea by the tail, locking him up in a two-column box, making him do his tricks for the benefit of all the folks in town.

WHAT READERS SAY

Ad Staff to Blame

AURORA, Ill., Aug. 7, 1924.

I am wondering if this publisher's lack of satisfactory advertising patronage may not be within his own organization.

It often happens that in the advertising department of a small newspaper there is too much economy practiced.

A newspaper situation always provides a lot of unreasoning and unreasonable opposition from a lot of business men who are ignorant of the whys of such a situation and too bullheaded or thick-headed to learn. They influence others, and thus make a newspaper condition a hard one to handle.

The way to handle it is to refuse to argue about it, and to sell advertising on its merit rather than to solicit on the ground that the paper deserves support. This takes real advertising salesmen, and real advertising salesmen cost money, but they are worth it. A man who can earn $100 a week is a lot more profitable than one at $20 a week, even if the $20 man is earning it, which he most likely is not.

I suspect a part, if not all, of the troubles of the publisher under discussion would be solved if he had a really first-class advertising soliciting force.

J. K. GROOM,
Director National Advertising Northern Illinois Group.

He Copyrighted "News Quiz"

TO EDITOR AND PUBLISHER:—I notice in your "Hunches" column a suggestion by a contributor of a feature in which the newspaper prints daily a list of questions based on the daily news in its columns, to stimulate a careful reading of the paper and as a quiz to test the reader's news knowledge.

The Evening World has been running a feature devised by myself of the very same nature for the past month and doubtless it is from this source that your contributor got the idea, since the similarity is too close to admit of coincidence. This feature is a copyrighted one and may not be used by any newspaper without contractual arrangements and for this reason I should be grateful if you would give this communication notice in your columns.

"Tidal Wave"

TO EDITOR & PUBLISHER:—While reading EDITOR & PUBLISHER, I was interested to note the story by Hammond Edward Franklin about the Columbus, O., Building & Loan Association.

This certainly is a powerful tribute to the power of newspaper advertising and in this connection a prominent building and loan man who has been co-operating with the United States League of Building & Loan Associations and the Thrift Committee told me that last January there was considerable more building and loan advertising done than has been in previous years.

This was entirely due to the co-operation between the United States League of Building & Loan Associations and the National Thrift Committee. When 10,000 of these building and loan movements begin to develop and advertise, there will be a regular tidal wave.

JNO. A. GOODELL,
Executive Secretary, National Thrift Week.

VIRGINIA DAILIES PLAN TO ADVERTISE STATE

Meet Informally at Call of Richmond News Leader to Discuss Campaign —Newspaper Problems Also Considered

Representatives of every daily newspaper in Virginia met at an informal conference in Richmond, Monday, Aug. 11, to make preliminary plans for advertising co-operatively the resources of the state. The meeting was called by the Richmond News Leader.

The conference convened following a luncheon at the Commonwealth Club at which the visitors were the guests of the News Leader.

Colonel H. L. Opie of the Staunton (Va.) Leader and the News-Leader presided as chairman. Junius P. Fishburn, of the Roanoke World News and the Times acted as secretary.

The idea of advertising the state was received with approval and plans were discussed for combining the dailies in an aggressive campaign.

Problems peculiar to the daily newspapers, were also discussed, every phase of publication being covered in the round table discussion that lasted throughout the afternoon. There were no speeches.

Circulation, advertising, paper costs and supply, machinery and ink problems were thoroughly dissected by the executives.

A number of the state dailies were represented by publisher, editor and business manager alike, others sending at least one representative. The ready response to the call for the informal gathering and the enthusiasm with which those present participated in the discussions that followed resulted in the decision to hold a similar conference within the next 4 or 5 months.

Also, the "News of the World" with Sunday editions of 3,000,000 came in for its share of glory.

"The Mirror" (over a million daily), "The Express" (850,000), "The Times" and Messrs. Hulton likewise were proudly cited by our British cousins.

When the Americans visited the plants of these publishers, however, they felt right at home.

For there they recognized Goss Presses on the job the same as they are in the pressrooms of America's leading publications. And they found British pressmen as loyal to Goss Presses as are American pressmen.

Some forty-eight Goss Sextuple and Octuple Presses are in the service of leading London newspapers alone. Many more throughout Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand and Canada.

Publishers throughout the British Empire and the European continent favor Goss Presses as highly as do American publishers. Appreciation of the best is, after all, a universal trait.

JOHNSON CITY DAILIES IN MERGER

Staff-News and Chronicle Now Directed by Single Corporation Headed by Smith-News Combined with Staff

Owners of 3 newspapers in Johnson City, Tenn., the News, the Staff, and the Chronicle, this week formed a new corporation, the Appalachian Publishers, Inc., pooled their assets and liabilities and will issue two newspapers, the Chronicle, morning, and the Staff-News, afternoon.

GUY L. SMITH

The new corporation is capitalized at $250,000. Guy L. Smith, president of the Chronicle Publishing Company, is the president of the new concern. Separate boards of directors will control policies of the papers.

This week's consolidation and incorporation is the culmination of a newspaper war which started soon after Munsey Slack, publisher of the Staff, sold his newspaper to the Chronicle.

Old employes of the Staff, headed by Charles N. Carson, former Staff general manager, launched the News. It was backed by $75,000 subscribed by 300 shareholders.

Last Thursday, Aug. 7, the News ceased publication and appeared as the Staff-News.

The new corporation claims that an economic loss of $100,000 annually is eliminated by the deal.

TIT FOR TAT

ADVERTISING and editorial jealousies are being aired in the literary department of the Cincinnati Times-Star. George M. Payne, literary editor of the Times-Star, recently printed the following:

CHAPTER I

The Critic—In reviewing Henry Justin Smith's notable story of "Josslyn," the record of a newspaper man's career and his reactions to his experiences, the critic made bold to say that the news department of a newspaper was the essential department.

CHAPTER II

Critic of the Critic—"C. B.," writing to the Critic, made equally bold to say that if it were not for the advertising department the critic would "starve to death," a most terrible fate.

CHAPTER III

Adding Fuel to the Flame—Now comes "C. B. F.," also bold, and deposes as follows, to wit.

Mr. George M. Payne, Literary Editor, Times-Star:

Dear Sir—The criticism of the news department by some friend of the advertising department, as printed on the book page of The Times-Star, Thursday, reminds me of a story I heard in New York. An advertising agent told one of the New York editors that he would starve but for the advertising agents. The editor replied: "If it were not for us 'writer fellers' most of you advertising 'fellers' would be selling fish from the tail of a cart." C. B. F.

Montana State Press Association closed its 39th annual convention at Lewiston, Saturday, Aug. 9, with the reelection of President O. S. Warden, general manager of the Great Falls Tribune, and Secretary S. E. Peterson. The meeting opened Aug. 7. Attending members declared the sessions the most successful ever held.

Among the speakers were Martin J. Hutchins, editor of the Missoula Missoulian; G. M. Moss, editor, Whitefish Pilot; Dean Stone of the Montana School of Journalism; M. A. Brannon, Chancellor of the Montana State University; C. G. Manning, Superintendent of the Lewiston Schools; L. L. Calloway, Chief Justice of the Montana Supreme Court; Mrs. W. T. Perham, prominent club woman of Glendive; W. L. Stockston, president, Montana Farm Bureau; Fred Morrell, U. S. District Forester; C. H. Purcell, engineer, Bureau of Public Roads, Portland; Col. C. S. Albert, of the Legal Department of Great Northern Railway; Sam Freed, Denver Matt staff, Chicago; and Chester C. Davis, Montana Commissioner of Agriculture.

The pushing of a good roads program, preservation of forests, loyalty of its people to products of the state, the sheep and the wool industry, and kindred subjects were thoroughly discussed. Commissioner Davis dwelt strongly on the agricultural resources of Montana and demonstrated that there had been a steady and rapid increase in soil productions of the state for the past decade with the single exception of the year 1919 which was the only complete drouth ever suffered by the state. This year's production of wheat alone was estimated at 60,000,000 bushels.

This new series, No. 6, will consist of 52 pieces, about 250 words each, and will be available in proof form September 1.

To cover cost of printing and promotion a charge has been fixed of only 3 cents per thousand circulation per week, and if any paper thinks this is too much it is at liberty to fix its own price.

Proofs will be ready September 1, and may be obtained without charge by addressing Herbert H. Smith, 723 Witherspoon Bldg., Philadelphia, Pa.

LOOKING backward from the pinnacle of 23 years, N. C. Dodge, cartoonist for the Manchester (N. H.) Union-Leader, writes the following confessions:

"Alas—the world and I cannot agree. I claim the title of cartoonist.

N. C. Dodge.

"My father and the populace had the same trouble. The day I entered the world, he argued with the neighbors as to whether the church bell and the factory whistle were announcing my arrival or the speeding danger of a brush fire outside the city.

"I was born June 13, 1901, thus gaining prominence for one of the three times in my life. Marriage and death are yet to come. I was born in Manchester where there are plenty of other odd characters. Reared in a mill town, I played with the Portuguese and the Greeks and gained my first intimate knowledge of the English language in the primary school.

"I was graduated from Manchester high school, never asking how for fear of a mistake. My graduation from Dartmouth with the class of '22, convinced me mistakes are made even in college. Later I learned what the B. S. was they gave me.

"I made the track team at Dartmouth easily and was picked to enter the first race. Then they told me it was an elimination event and that together with 100 others I was released. After that I sung in the college choir at chapel, keeping silent on special occasions when visitors were present.

"My first official act, when called on to face the world alone, was to break an arm cranking an ancient Ford. I then composed a cartoon on "Crank versus Self Starter," which was universally rejected but always accompanied by the personal apologies of the editor.

"During college I successfully submitted several drawings to the Dartmouth Jack O'Lantern during the dull seasons. For the past two years I have been the budding staff artist with the Manchester Union-Leader. A few months after I began work for the Sunday Union-Leader, it suspended publication indefinitely. How I get by, I can't explain. Here's hoping my luck grows correspondingly with my nerve."

New York Retains Lead In Total Earnings

EARNING power of a territory indicates more directly than wealth, the strength for immediate business activity. The creators of the greatest wealth are the greatest spenders.

In the preliminary report for income taxation (just issued) for 1922, New York State is shown to have reported incomes of $4,110,588,989. The amount of tax paid was $273,960,079 on 1,102,748 returns filed. New York State contributed 31.82 per cent of the total tax paid. The next highest state paid only 10.87 per cent of the whole.

The average income of those reporting in New York State was $3,727.41 as compared with $3,391.73 the previous year. Government figures indicate that the State's per capita net income was $383.71 on a population of 10,712,680, the per capita income tax being $25.57.

New York State with a total wealth of $36,986,638,000 is the wealthiest community in the world.

New York State presents more attractions for any manufacturer than can be found elsewhere. The really big merchandising successes are obtained by going where the big money is—and the Empire State is the successful National Advertiser's big money maker.

Stricken at Summer Home in Michigan Following Illness at Democratic Convention—Prominent in Journalism for Three Decades

HENRY MEANS PINDELL, 63, publisher and owner of the Peoria Journal and Transcript, and for three decades a prominent figure in Illinois and middle western journalism, was stricken suddenly at his summer home at Northport Point, Mich., Friday, Aug. 8, and died at 7 o'clock in the evening. Funeral services were held from the Peoria home, Monday afternoon and newspaper men from the state gathered to pay their last tribute.

Mr. Pindell was first taken ill at the Democratic Convention where he was active in the McAdoo campaign and worked unceasingly for the Californian. At the 37th ballot Frederick A. Stowe, Journal-Transcript editor, who was at the Convention became alarmed at Mr. Pindell's weakening condition and urged him to return to his summer home. He left the East July 2.

The Late Henry M. Pindell

Mr. Pindell was born in St. Joseph, Mo., Dec. 23, 1860. He received the degree of A. B. from De Pauw University in 1884. He served as a reporter on the Chicago Tribune, business manager of a country newspaper, then became city editor of a daily in Springfield, where he was elected city treasurer in 1887.

When he founded the Herald he had no capital of the cash sort—but an abundance of that super-capital which people call brains and energy. Peoria was not a promising field for a new morning newspaper, for the historic Transcript was strongly intrenched. In spite of this, the Herald prospered from the first. Mr. Pindell did not believe, however, in destructive rivalry, the burden of which is always assessed upon the business men of a community. Instead of trying to destroy the Transcript, he bought it. And the Herald-Transcript became at once a powerful factor in Illinois journalism.

Soon afterward the Evening times was started, with an Associated Press membership. Mr. Pindell did not consider the paper was needed in the field, and he purchased it, selling it at once to Jacob Barnes, of the Evening Journal. In 1902 he disposed of the Herald-Transcript and bought the Evening Journal, proceeding to develop it into a metropolitan newspaper, with modern equipment and up-to-date features. In 1916 the Transcript was again offered for sale and Mr. Pindell consolidated it with the Journal. He became editor and owner of a morning, evening and Sunday newspaper. Mr. Pindell attracted national attention in 1913, when President Wilson nominated him for the post of Ambassador to Russia. Some metropolitan newspapers in the East, with characteristic provincialism, raised the inquiry: "Who is Pindell?" The people of the Central West knew who he was—and the President knew. But partisanship in the Senate resulted in delays as to his confirmation. President Wilson responded to this situation by submitting his appointment to the Senate a second time—and it was promptly confirmed. Mr. Pindell as promptly declined the appointment—to the great regret of his friends, among whom he counted hundreds of the leading newspaper makers of the country.

In the second year of the World War Mr. Pindell visited the French and Belgian trenches, obtaining a close-up view of the nature and significance of the great struggle. From the moment when the United States declared war on Germany he subordinated all other newspaper efforts and policies to the service of the nation.

Mr. Pindell was a member of the Society of the Cincinnati, the Lambs, Phi Gamma Delta Fraternity, the University Club in Chicago and the Country, Creve Cœur and University clubs in Peoria.

WHAT THEY ARE SAYING

A COMPLETE BUYING GUIDE

"THE newspapers today are a complete buying guide and the public is becoming more and more used to buying from newspaper advertising. That being true, the dealer ought to have as complete a showing of merchandise as possible in his show window. All departments should be represented and none should dominate."—James W. Fisk, Merchandising Counsel, Milwaukee Journal.

* * * * *

ATTRACT ATTENTION FIRST

"THE great thing to remember in advertising in a newspaper is that to go into a newspaper is like going into a big hall, except the newspaper has tens of thousands or hundreds of thousands of readers. The first thought should be to attract attention. After you have attracted attention you can talk to them fairly in detail."—Arthur Brisbane.

* * * * *

MUST TRAIN MEN TO SELL

"THE time has arrived when we must show more appreciation of the value of training men to sell. We would not place our smallest newspaper press in charge of an unskilled mechanic. Yet some of us engage young men with little or no training to represent our publications, expecting them to sell pages of valuable display space varying according to the publication from five cents to several dollars a line."—Harvey R. Young, Advertising Manager, Columbus Dispatch.

* * * * *

CUT OUT BITTER COMPETITION

"A NEWSPAPER needs more advertisers rather than more advertising. We would rather have 100 advertisers using 500 columns a week than ten advertisers using the same amount. There are too few advertisers in many cities simply because newspaper men have not shown enough merchants how they can become advertisers. Solicitors often times compete too fiercely for the business of the small crop of present advertisers instead of developing new business. This usually bitter competition is not good for the newspaper or the advertiser."—A. L. Poorman, Advertising Manager, Providence (R. I.) Journal.

SUCCESSFULLY ADVERTISING FOOD PRODUCTS

"TO successfully advertise a food product there are three things you must have—a good product, a good sales force and a good distribution. You must have a product that will please, and one that will repeat, and the sales force must get it out into all points where the advertising reaches, for the best that advertising can do is to tell the people about this product."—H. E. Phelps of Williams & Cunnyngham.

TRY IT YOURSELF

The Manhattan office of the BROOKLYN STANDARD UNION in the Woolworth Tower is the highest advertising office in the world.

We get some queerly addressed letters up here, but the star of them all came a few days ago. It read:

In the Tallest B'ldg,
45 Seconds from B'way, City.

It arrived here without any delay.

Put an order in an envelope, and write a puzzle on the outside. We seem to be getting everything which ought to come our way.

STRIKE AVERTED AS TELEGRAPHERS SIGN WITH PRESS SERVICES

Three-Year Contract Calls for $2 Raise First Year, 50 Cents Succeeding Years—Can Reopen Negotiation Only Under "Abnormal Economic Situation"

AN innovation in long time labor contracts developed late last week, when Roscoe H. Johnson, international president of the press telegraphers' union, and union committeemen agreed with heads of the United Press Associations, Universal Service, and International News Service to maintain a 3-year agreement, stabilizing the service, unless an "abnormal economic situation" exists at the end of the second year.

Walk-out of nearly 500 press operators in newspapers and bureaus all over the country was averted by the move.

The agreement, reached late Friday, Aug. 8, provides a 3-year contract with a $2 a week increase in wages of all operators, both day and night, for the first year with a 50 cents a week increase for the next two years. The contract is retroactive to July 1.

The unusual clause in the contract reserves a reopening right at the end of the second year in the event of a "major economic dislocation." In case of dispute as to this right, it is further agreed to submit the issue to the Secretary of the Department of Labor or his appointees, whose decision will be "final and binding."

The clause follows in full:

"It is mutually agreed that if at the end of the second year of this contract an abnormal economic situation exists creating a major economic dislocation such as was created by the World War between 1915-1918 or as was created by the panic of 1893 or 1907 the men and the company reserve the right to reopen this contract, in the usual manner provided for the termination of contracts, for revision in harmony with economic conditions. It is understood that this agreement can only be reopened on the basis of the above-named causes and that a sectional or minor industrial or economic change cannot be used as a basis for reopening the contract. It is agreed that in case there is any dispute as to the right of either party to reopen this contract under this clause that the issue will be submitted to the Secretary of the Department of Labor or his appointees, whose decision will be final and binding."

Before this agreement was reached, union leaders and press association officials were deadlocked with a strike impending. Union leaders went so far as to take a strike vote.

Company officials were confident they would win, if the dispute was carried to the walk-out stage. But neither side wanted a strike. The press services preferred to deal with the union, but wanted relief from annual negotiations.

President Johnson long stood firm against a 3-year contract. On the other hand the press services were equally as adamant in favor of the long time agreement.

The nucleus of the accepted contract had been handed down early this month in the form of a suggestion by Hywel Davies, representative of the Department of Labor, who had been called in as arbitrator, when previous negotiations, which started July 1, had failed.

Davies recommended a 3-year contract with $1 a week increase each year. His recommendation was accepted by press service heads but rejected by the union.

The union had demanded increases ranging from $10.75 to $15.75 a week. The press associations demanded $2.50 a week reduction, pleading decrease in the cost of living.

Wages before the accepted present contract were from $41.75 per week for day work up to $60.75 per week; and for night work from $42.25 to $60.75.

Settlement of the dispute was reached by Karl Bickel, president of the United Press Associations, Chester Hope, editor, Universal Service, and George C. Shor, editor and general manager of the International News Service, and President Johnson, A. T. Maddux, J. P. Frayn, V. J. McTiernan, C. E. Landers, R. M. Pollock, and M. B. Norton, representing the union.

REVEAL "INSIDE" STORY

Political Writers Tell How They Worked at Clarksburg

Several correspondents, covering the "notification" at Clarksburg this week, let the public in on some of the secrets of newspaper political writers.

Robert Barry, political writer for the Philadelphia Public Ledger and the New York Evening Post, for instance, devoted several paragraphs to a talk with Col. "Mike" Hennessy, Boston Globe correspondent, with a description of "Mike's" cane. He also told how the news writers tried the Clarksburg golf courses.

Lindsay Denison informed readers of his newspaper, the New York Evening World, just how the press representatives were received by the Clarksburg Democrats.

"It is a delirium," he telegraphed.

"And that isn't all. Out on the station plaza is the Hon. James Preston of the Senate press gallery at Washington.

"You stand right here, Jim says, and he'll have a car for you in just a minute. You stand. Along comes big bustling John Edward Nevin, Mr. Davis's own press contact man.

"He wants to know what you are standing gawking about on a corner for. You explain that when you were a little boy your grandmother made you promise to do just as Jim Preston said and are doing it. Mr. Nevin suggested that Mr. Preston could go somewhere that no grandmother would have sent him and hurls you into a car."

"Just one final item," the same writer concluded his dispatch, "showing how thoroughly Clarksburg is on the job this day. All newspaper despatches are carried from the Davis home and from the headquarters to the Western Union offices by uniformed motorcycle policemen of the Clarksburg force."

OF course that is not actually net income. As figures, they are misleading, but by matching them with such figures from other states and dividing by population you will sense a measure of West Virginia's possibilities for your business and of the richness of its people.

This state, which ranks 40th among the states in size and 27th in population, ranks second in value of mineral wealth.

In West Virginia the National Advertiser gets concentration of buying units in a few chief centers.

SEYMOUR B. CONGER

He is a newspaper man of long training. Graduated from the University of Michigan with an A. B. degree in 1900, he took an A. M. in 1903. During these college years he worked on the staff of the Grand Rapids (Mich.) Evening Press, and afterwards became connected with the Associated Press, remaining with the latter organization nearly 20 years.

For the A. P. he was stationed at St. Petersburg, Russia, during the revolution and the Russo-Japanese war, from 1904 to 1910. Then for the next 7 years he was director of A. P.'s Berlin bureau. When war was declared, he became a war correspondent, attached to German and Austro-Hungarian forces on all fields of the European war, until the rupture of relations with Germany. In 1919 he covered the Paris peace conference for the Associated Press and the submission of German and Austrian treaties and signature of peace at Versailles.

Joining the Philadelphia Public Ledger staff in 1920, he gained the distinction of being the first correspondent to reach Brest-Litovsk and get through the story of the battle between Bolshevists and Poles.

George Pfann, all-American quarterback at Cornell University last year, has written a short series of football articles for the Boys' and Girls' page, syndicated by Associated Editors, Inc., Chicago.

Crosby of U. S. Embassy Makes Re-establishment Possible

The United Press Associations on Aug. 12 resumed service to old clients at Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, having been barred from that country for several weeks together with the Associated Press on action taken by the Brazilian government during the revolution.

When EDITOR & PUBLISHER went to press, the Associated Press had not yet received notification as to their re-establishment. Such notification, however, was expected shortly.

Re-establishment of the press associations was made possible through the efforts of Secretary Crosby of the American Embassy in Brazil.

The press services were barred from Brazil during the recent revolution in that country because they persisted in sending news dispatches from Buenos Aires and other South American points regarding the fighting, thereby escaping Brazilian censorship.

C. M. Kinsolving, U. P. business representative at Rio de Janeiro, is now enroute for New York, where he will arrive about Aug. 20. Ulysses G. Keener remains in Brazil in charge of the news service.

Before going into agency work about 10 years ago, he was advertising manager of the Globe Machine and Stamping Company. The Mailbag is published in Cleveland.

LINKS WITH BRITAIN

CHORLEY WOOD and CHENIES

The charming scenery at Chorley Wood, and its nearness to London (20 miles), has caused this district to be a favourite place for a day's outing. At King's Hall Farm, Chorley Wood, William Penn was married to Guilielma Maria Springett on April 4th, 1672.

Chenies, nearby, is one of the most beautiful villages in England. Charming and well cared for cottages surround the village green, which is sheltered by great elm trees. This place was for years the holiday resort of Matthew Arnold, and the great historian, Anthony Froude, who has justly observed that it is "artificially preserved from the intrusion of modern ways."

By JAMES MELVIN LEE

FOR some reason the Saturday Evening Post has become a persistent and a consistent critic of the press. In the issue for Aug. 16. it prints a column editorial, "Trial by Headline." The title is sufficient to indicate its contents. In the matter of constructive criticism the editorial is not so specific, but it does offer the following suggestion:

Reform in this instance must come from within. As no method of regulation could be tolerated—nor indeed be devised with any hope of practical success—it devolves on the editor himself to draw the line between freedom and license. The suggestion has been made that the solution would be to have all court reporters recruited from the ranks of the legal profession. In urging this step in the course of a recent address before the New York City Bar Association, Henry W. Taft made the point that a correct report, putting the right emphasis on the important points in the evidence, could be made only by one versed in legal matters. He pointed out further that newspapers have established the practice of using specialists in practically every other branch of news. Men of literary attainments are selected for book criticism, musicians are intrusted with the music columns, experts are employed to cover prize fights, baseball matches and billiard championships. Special knowledge and accuracy are demanded in all these lines, but when it comes to court trials and judicial proceedings the same standard is not applied.

When newspapers, in reporting the news of courtrooms, exceed the legitimate bounds they should be criticized. But newspapers are not publishing fiction, they are recording facts. Lack of respect for courts often comes from what is done in the courtrooms and not from what the newspapers print.

The editorial in the Post is right when it says reform must come from within, but it will be within the courtroom as much as within the editorial room—if courts of justice are to have that respect to which, under right administration, they are entitled. It will be a sad day for American liberty when newspapers cannot print the truth about what goes on in the courtroom.

THE job office of the Baltimore Sun publishes occasionally a periodical called The Sunbeam. The current issue, known as the Henry Edward Warner Number, reprints some of the popular verse which Mr. Warner has published in the Denver Times, Baltimore News, St. Paul Dispatch, Baltimore Evening Sun, and Richmond Times-Dispatch. Yes, it includes some of his "Songs of the Craft" which he has published in EDITOR & PUBLISHER. For this reason the edition has special interest for the readers of this department.

Mr. Warner is a versatile poet and humorist as this collection of verses abundantly proves. His "The Rag Doll" will go straight to the heart of every parent, and his "The Boogy Man" will make the children cry for more. A perusal of the latter will demonstrate why "Henry Ed," as he is known to newspaper friends, is "Uncle Henry" to thousands of children who hear his verse from Station WCAO at Baltimore. A copy of this issue of the Sunbeam may be obtained upon application to the Sun Book and Job Printing Office, Baltimore, Md.

TRIBUTE to Grant Goodrich, one of the founders of the Chicago Daily Journal, is paid in "The Story of Northwestern University," by Estelle Frances Ward, which has just been issued. Mr. Goodrich helped to found the university six years after he had aided in the establishment of the Journal.

THE house organ "Meredith's Merchandising Advertising" is a service sheet for salesmen. Its aim is to show how to make good advertising produce sales. The August issue opens with an article entitled "Pictures That Sell." From it these pertinent remarks are taken:

"There are fashions in advertising, and they have about the same effect upon business as fashions in dress," remarked the cloak and suit salesman.

"In the long skirt age, long copy was the vogue. Every advertisement looked like a page from a mail order catalog—solid paragraphs of small type, which you needed a magnifying glass to read. The advertiser told all about it—fluently and passionately.

"Then as the skirts got higher, the copy got shorter. Pictures began telling part of the story, and some extremists tried to make pictures do it all. Many of these pictures, however, were merely of the 'pretty girl' type and had nothing whatever to do with the merchandise advertised. They went along with the bird's-eye view of the factory and the picture of the baby saying, 'My Daddy makes hay-rakes.'

"After the excitement of the post-war boom died down, most of us in the sales department began asking, 'What's the matter with the advertising?' It didn't pull. Sales were hard to make. Everything was different from the days when we merely traveled around and told our dealers how much they could have.

"Our Advertising Department got busy and created real selling copy—pictures that made people want our goods, backed up by facts that convinced the reader and arguments that clinched our claims. Dealers took new interest in life and our salesmen resumed mailing orders instead of weather reports."

Laboratory tests show that 84 per cent of all impressions are received through the eye. Pictures talk in a language that everybody understands. The right illustration puts the idea across at a glance. Good copy is a word picture that makes people see the advantages of your proposition.

Other good features in this issue are the articles entitled "The Dealer's Interest in Advertising" and "The Advertising Cost Bogey."

NEWSPAPER English, in spite of all that academic critics may say, is usually remarkable for its clearness—thanks to the copy desk. In many instances it has more force than is usually found in other forms of writing and sometimes has what rhetoricians call "elegance." True, a pedantic paragraph is often broken up into smaller units as a special courtesy to the reader.

Prepositions are such small words that many writers are often careless in their use. Even the copy desk is more apt to slip on a preposition than on any other kind of word. Consequently, the little book "Prepositions—How to Use Them" by Frank H. Vizetelly, Litt. D., LL.D., editor of the New Standard Dictionary (Funk and Wagnalls) is just the book for desk men to have at hand for ready reference. In less than 50 pages Mr. Vizetelly explains the relations of prepositions to other words in the formation of sentences and gives 2,500 examples of usage drawn from English literature. Evidently he had the working press in mind, for he has boiled everything down to the smallest possible space.

If any man knows how to use the English language correctly it ought to be the editor of the Standard Dictionary. In his foreword Mr. Vizetelly does not hesitate to use the inverted passive, "we are taught something," page 3. Grammarians who insist that an active verb in the passive voice cannot be followed by a noun in the objective case will have some difficulty in explaining the syntax of the noun "something" in the sentence just quoted. On page 4 Mr. Vizetelly does not hesitate to split infinitives in the first and the second paragraph. The natural deduction is that the inverted passage may be used and infinitives may be split if clearness be maintained and force be not sacrificed.

Newspaper Critic Writes Novel

Laurence Stalling, book reviewer for the New York World, has written his first novel, "Plumes," which will be published by Harcourt, Brace & Co., Aug. 21. It is a story of a returning soldier and his wife with a background of Washington.

Rotogravure Leadership

The New York Times published 546,732 lines of rotogravure advertising in seven months of 1924, more than any other newspaper in the world. Its gain over the corresponding period of 1923 was 92,134 lines—nearly one and one-half times the gain of the next New York newspaper. The Times' excess over the second newspaper was 220,422 lines of rotogravure advertising.

BUSINESS TICKLER

Thousands of women returning from summer vacations will want to refurnish their homes.

Awnings put up for the summer season will soon have to come down. Heavier drapery will replace the light cretonne.

Keep after the coal situation, for the cry of "Buy Now" appeals both to the seller and consumer.

"Cold as Ice" headed a full page of advertising in a Southern paper. Refrigerators, ice dealers, confectionery (ice cream) parlors and even a live clothing merchant advertised summer union suits under the caption "Get Inside One of Our Ice Boxes for $1.00."—George C. Marcley, Ogdensburg, N. Y.

Get up a special "Electrical Edition" of your paper carrying news stories about local electrical things of interest, such as radio, automotive electrical appliances, etc. Then get into this edition of the paper all the local stores handling electrical goods of any sort whatsoever—radio, medical, automotive, housekeeping, etc.—Frank H. Williams, Fort Wayne, Ind.

The Washington (D. C.) Times, with a recent gigantic cooperative used-car sale of many local dealers, disposed of considerable advertising space for several days. Numerous makes of cars sold by many dealers were described. Special exhibits were displayed in the spacious ball park, but all the ads were handled together under one general heading, with one design.—C. M. Litteljohn, Washington, D. C.

We have started a Repair Directory which runs every week in our newspaper, being sold on a yearly basis. An attention compelling cut is used at the top along with the heading and a few words about economy. Then follow the advertisements of a tire shop, tailor, optician, welder, garage, furnace repairman, etc. The feature was an easy one to sell.—Donald O. Ross, Washington (Ia.) Democrat.

If you're after a new idea to pass along to an automobile dealer here it is! The Donovan Motor Company of Boston has been running a big Donovan Liberty Bond contest in which a Liberty bond is presented to every person who buys a car in a specific month. No bond is less than $100, some run as high as $200. Naturally, newspaper space was used liberally to exploit the idea, which applied to new cars only, Studebakers.—James M. Mosely, Boston, Mass.

Secretary Hoover is urging the public to "Buy your coal now." There are many reasons why coal should be purchased and stored away during the summer months. What are conditions in your city? A visit to the coal yards and dealers will make an interesting and instructive story. Hook up the feature with ads from the coal men. They should see the advantage of this publicity—make 'em.—R. C. Bolton, Jr., New York City.

BUICK REORGANIZES PUBLICITY

Will Discontinue Service to Dailies and Distribute Through Dealers

Buick Motor Company, Flint, Mich., announced Aug. 9 it had ceased sending publicity stories direct to newspapers, hereafter planning to send its automobile editor service direct to branches, distributors, and dealers, who will deliver the stories to newspaper men in their locality.

A. Brown Batterson, director of advertising, for the Buick company, is originator of the plan.

"It is our purpose to send out only such stories as we believe have news value, or human interest enough to warrant them being published, and be of help to the newspaper in furnishing news regarding the automobile industry to its readers," Batterson announced.

Batterson has notified all branch advertising managers to keep in close touch with their local newspapers, asking them to find out what, if anything, is objectionable to the editors in the publicity being sent.

"We personally, in buying advertising, consider only the advertising value of a newspaper, and if in our opinion it should be used for advertising, we use it regardless of whether it uses our news service or not," he stated.

Connecticut Publisher Dies

Elwood Star Ela, 65, founder and publisher of the Manchester (Conn.) Evening Herald, died at his home in Manchester, Aug. 12. Born in Decatur, Ill., he came east and in 1882 started the Herald as a weekly newspaper.

FORMER EVENING POST PUBLISHER DIES

James S. Seymour Was Prominent in Newspaper and Magazine Circles —One Time General Manager Crowell Publishing Co.

James Sherwood Seymour, 54, retired New York and Chicago newspaper and magazine publisher, died in New York Aug. 11. He was for many years publisher of the New York Evening Post, and was one time general manager of the Chicago Record-Herald.

Starting his publishing career at 28 with Harper & Brothers, Mr. Seymour joined the staff of the Evening Post 4 years later. Under his direction, the Post, despite its admittedly small circulation, was put on a paying basis.

In this, his first connection with the Post, Mr. Seymour remained 7 years, and then resigned to become publisher of the old New York Commercial Advertiser, later the Globe. This position he left in turn to succeed Alexander A. McCormick as publisher and general manager of the Chicago Record-Herald, that paper then being under the ownership of Victor F. Lawson, also owner of the Chicago Daily News. He retained his position for 11 years, resigning to accept the general managership of the Crowell Publishing Company of New York, publishers of the Woman's Home Companion, American Magazine, and Farm and Fireside. He was with the Crowell people for 7 years, resigning that connection to return to the Evening Post.

This return to the Evening Post was at the time of that newspaper's sale to Thomas W. Lamont by Oswald Garrison Villard. Mr. Seymour was largely instrumental in negotiating this deal. For several years he acted as director in an advisory capacity, and then early in 1918 was again made publisher. He served until 1920, retiring then because of illness. While engaged in the newspaper business he was active in the affairs of the Associated Press for many years and was at one time treasurer and a director of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association.

Mr. Seymour was a member of the Century Association, the Manhattan Club and a Governor of the Laurentian Club. He is survived by his wife, who was Martha Palmer when he married her in 1887; two daughters, Laura and Jane, and two sons, Edward P. Seymour, who is advertising manager of Farm and Fireside Magazine, and Theodore P. Seymour, assistant manager of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association.

Prints Daily on Silk

For presentation to President Obregon of Mexico on his recent visit to Nogales, Ariz., H. R. Sisk, publisher of the Nogales (Ariz.) Herald, printed two 12-page copies of his newspaper on silk. The feat was the more remarkable for the reason that the silk "papers" were printed upon a high speed press.

Seneca Falls (N. Y.) Reveille, has been incorporated for $20,000. Earl D. Clark owns the controlling interest in the new company.

ELLIS WINS IN PRESS BLANKET CASE

Patent Admitted Valid and Settlement Is Made in Favor of Worcester Publisher and Mechanical Superintendent

The suit of Frank E. Ellis and Theodore T. Ellis of Worcester, Mass., brought in the United States District Court, against Frank E. Paige and against Tingue, Brown Company of New York, in which claim was made that the defendants were infringing the Ellis Automatic Blanket patent, 1,296,782, of March 11, 1919, has been settled in favor of the plaintiffs and decree has been entered enjoining the defendants from further infringement of the Ellis patents.

The defendants admit that the patent is a valid and lawful patent, admit infringement and have signed and authorized the following statement:

"The trade is familiar with the suit brought by the owners of the Ellis 'Automatic' blanket patent No. 1,296,782 of March 11, 1919, to enjoin the manufacture and sale of the 'Economy' blanket. We wish to announce that a decree has been entered in said suit sustaining this patent and enjoining Tingue, Brown & Co. from making or selling press blankets like the 'Economy' and from in any way infringing said patent. Tingue, Brown & Co. must, therefore, stop forthwith all manufacture and sale of the 'Economy' press blankets. All orders for press blankets of this kind should be sent to the New England Newspaper Supply Company of Worcester, Mass.

"In order to settle in full all claims of the owners of said Ellis patent for profits and damages caused by our infringing, manufacture and sale of the 'Economy' blanket, as well as all claims for profits and damages against the purchasers and users of the 'Economy' blanket, Tingue, Brown & Co. have assigned to the owners of the Ellis patent that part of its business that relates to press blankets, printers' and newspaper supplies, together with the good will, trade marks, patents, relating thereto. All future orders for gold cloth, molding blankets, 'Everwear' drying blankets, 'Tibrode' rubber blankets, 'Tindeck,' as well as 'Economy blankets' should be sent direct to the New England Newspaper Supply Company, Worcester, Mass.

"We take this opportunity to thank our many customers for their valued patronage and feel that their future requirements will be efficiently attended to by the New England Newspaper Supply Company.

Very truly yours,
TINGUE, BROWN & CO.,
W. J. Tingue, Pres.

August 7, 1924."

This case has been in court more than two years and its outcome been waited with interest by every newspaper publisher.

The automatic blanket has been on the market since 1915 and has revolutionized the printing of newspapers. The outcome of this suit gives the New England Fiber Blanket Company, of 30 Shrewsbury street, Worcester, the exclusive right to its manufacture.

Theodore T. Ellis is the owner and publisher of the Worcester Telegram-Gazette and Frank E. Ellis is the mechanical superintendent of the same papers.

The Automatic Blanket was invented by Frank E. Ellis in 1914 when he was the superintendent of the press room of the Boston Herald.

The Automatic Blanket revolutionized the printing of newspapers, and it is in general use throughout the world.

The genesis of the Automatic Blanket was a sheet of celluloid commonly used as wind shields for automobiles. A sheet of this celluloid was used in the Boston Herald press room to pull proofs for pictorial printing, and the idea was conceived by Frank E. Ellis to attach a sheet of celluloid to a re-pressed felt blanket. Many experiments were made before the first successful blanket was produced.

German newspapers have no right to print a man's picture contrary to his will, the Berlin Chamber Court ruled recently in a case brought against the management of the Berlin Action. The newspaper reproduced a snapshop of Herr Siegfried Jacobson, who, for reasons unstated, objected to so much publicity.

JUNIOR COLLEGES OF TEXAS LAUNCH COOPERATIVE NEWSPAPER DRIVE

Large Copy Used to Place Merits of State Preparatory Schools Before Parents—To Run Through Summer

By A. W. ROE

THE Texas Junior College Association has launched the initial advertisement in its big campaign, planned to reach the parents of boys and girls in an endeavor to have parents select a junior college in Texas in which to place their children just after they have been graduated from high school. According to the treasurer of the junior college association, Dean George Pickens of Westmorland College, San Antonio, this movement grew out of the meeting of junior college presidents and executives, held at Waco, when a permanent association of the junior colleges of Texas was perfected and a continuous and summer long co-operative advertising campaign in the leading newspapers of Texas was decided upon.

The association plans to run a large advertisement every Sunday in the papers selected and smaller advertisements during the week throughout the summer.

The opening advertisement was two columns in width and a half column in depth. In the border at the top of the advertisement was this caption: "Your Boy or Girl Should Go to a Junior College First."

The text of the advertisement was arranged under four sub-heads. The first of these, "Too Young for the University," stated the dangers surrounding the boy at the university, emphasizing the danger of his falling in with the wrong crowd. The second, "The Tremendous Freshman Class Gives Little Chance for Individual Training," is self explanatory. The third, "Benefits of First College Experience in Your Home State," gave reasons for sending the boy or girl to college in Texas first.

Under the caption, "What These Texas Junior Colleges Can Do for Your Boy or Girl," the advertisement summarized the claims of the junior college thus: "Limited student bodies and adequate instructors to give close, personal, individual attention. Refined, Christian, home-life and interested, friendly, careful supervision. Fine faculties of university trained men and women. All courses desired, including best of fine arts. Modern buildings and excellent equipment. Texas acquaintances that will mean much in after life. Better preparation to enter largest universities as full-fledged juniors."

A poster in a corner of the advertisement gave a list of the junior colleges of Texas that are members of the Texas Junior College Association and called for letters from the public.

HUNCHES

One Dollar Will Be Paid for Each "Hunch" published.

"DO you know your fellow townsmen?" This is the caption of a feature appearing weekly in the Trenton (N. J.) Sunday Times-Advertiser. On page two are shown pictures of local residents whose photos have been recently published. These pictures are numbered, and on page four the names and a line or two of information about the persons is published. This feature has attracted considerable interest and is looked for regularly.—Ralph C. Edgar, Trenton, N. J.

The Erie Despatch Herald has four columns daily written by visiting reporters, "who stroll from day to day to all parts of the city, interviewing people in the busy marts of trade, and asking housewives for the news in their neighborhoods."—R. C. Mowbray, Hampton Roads, Va.

Reporters working on newspapers in cities under 100,000 population can get stories that have a punch in them and create considerable comment. Take a city directory, a new one is better, and pick out the names of people named Wolf, Bear, Fox, etc. Pick out the names of persons with names of things, etc. Pick out people whose names are the names of occupations, baker, barber, etc. You can find the most amazing names in a city directory, and royalty is there, too; for instance, the King, Queen, Duke, Prince, Regal and Count families are generally to be found. We have tried this twice here and have got good results.—W. C. Stouffer, Roanoke, Virginia.

How about a special weather story? C. F. Marvin, chief of the government weather bureau at Washington, declares that meteorologists are on the threshold of new discoveries in the domain of forecasting which will enable the department to say what the weather will be a month and even a year in the future. What does your local weatherman know about it? Does he believe that it is possible to forecast weather with certainty for a long period? The weatherman's opinion of the prognostications in many almanacs will also be of interest to your readers.—A. C. Regli, Eau Claire, Wis.

Why not publish a series of lists of ten or a dozen books selected by representative persons in the community as being those which especially appeal to them for various reasons? Run as a daily feature, a series such as this should create great reader interest and might well develop into a constructive piece of journalism by fostering a more widespread interest in books.—Max Ballock, Fullerton (Cal.) News.

How can the children be kept happy and amused during warm weather? Interviews with playground workers, librarians, doctors, social workers and others will yield some good ideas for a warm-weather story. Maybe some photos will fit in well.—Jarmes M. Mosely, Boston, Mass.

Assign a reporter to go early every morning to the garages in your city which get most of the automobile tourist business, get acquainted with some of the tourists and many an interesting news item as well as interesting story for the automobile news page will come to light. This is the time of year to get the cream of it.—E. G., Chicago.

How do some of the members of your community dodge their city or town taxes? How much does the assessor believe will be lost this year (last year) through such dodging. Some people resort to tax-dodging lawyers, strange bookkeeping, non-declaration, or plain evasion. A reporter sent to interview chairman of the board of assessors may find some interesting answers and opinions.—C. M. Litteljohn, Washington, D. C.

BUILDING REALTOR ADS

New York Sun Develops Series of 12 Full Pages

The New York Sun has developed a series of 12 full page real estate advertisements, appearing monthly, advising the public on the advantage of dealing with a realtor and the possibilities in the purchase of real estate. Harold Goldman is the classified advertising manager directing the stunt.

WITH NUMEROUS BUYING RESOURCES

The SOUTH

IS AN EXCELLENT MARKET

The South is one of the most inviting trade sections in the United States. The South of today is not dependent upon any one crop nor limited to agricultural resources or other resources.

COTTON no longer holds the South in its power. Watermelons, cantaloupes, strawberries, grapes, peaches, tomatoes, apples and other fruits are bringing gold and silver to the banks of the South.

Sweet potatoes, lettuce, cabbages, peas, corn and other Southern vegetables are selling the South in Northern markets.

In manufactures, the South has more than kept pace with the rest of the country. In 1920 the value of products was one-sixth of the country's total. Industrial development is steadily going on throughout the South, not only the expansion of old established lines but the creation of new establishments and enterprises.

The South produces 60 per cent of the country's output of petroleum, or 35 per cent of the world's production, and in addition 60 per cent of the country's natural gas output.

Of 82 mineral products of the United States, the South produces 61 and for 34 of these products the leading or next to the leading producing state is in the South.

The South also produces a large quantity of meat and meat products, having 35 per cent of the country's swine, 33 per cent of the country's cattle and 19 per cent of the country's sheep.

National advertisers and space buyers should stop to realize that diversification of crops, abundant raw materials, power resources, and railroad facilities, all of which the South has, offer a solid foundation on which its industrial and agricultural development is founded.

Timeliness of Sunday News Features

SUNDAY PAPERS, on account of their enormous growth in size are becoming week-end journals as well as Sunday morning newspapers. Spontaneous news on Saturday nights measures a small proportion of the total text and picture space.

Yet the reader-demand is for timeliness—for stories of the week containing the last word. Articles prepared a week in advance for publication usually do not meet the demand for dispatches which will stand displaying in news sections. Cost of telegraphic collection and delivery have been reduced and the timeliness of news features increased by the Consolidated Press Association.

The Friday Night Leased Wire Service of C. P. A. consists of important week-end specials written in Europe and America on Friday night—transmitted at once and in type a few hours later in newspaper offices all over the country. These dispatches cover the week and are ready long before the Saturday night rush of box scores, spot telegraph and local. The variety touches every phase of reader interest.

"Advertising Costs Per Sale—"

Advertisers who check up on results remain in business and grow. Such advertisers don't buy mere areas of space, nor mere numbers of circulation. They buy advertising effectiveness as measured in returns upon their advertising expenditures.

With them advertising is an investment; they advertise in the mediums that most effectively reach the greatest number of financially competent consumers in any given community—and they judge effectiveness by results.

That is why The Chicago Daily News, year by year and by increasing margins, leads the Chicago daily newspaper field in the volume of display advertising printed. In the first seven months of 1924, for example, The Daily News printed 8,873,042 agate lines of display advertising—a gain of 199,136 lines over the same period of 1923—as against 6,766,953 lines—a gain of 65,515—published by its nearest competitor, a morning newspaper.

The 400,000 circulation of The Chicago Daily News—approximately 1,200,000 daily readers—is concentrated 94 per cent in Chicago and its nearby suburbs. Moreover, the circulation of The Daily News is a home circulation, and it enters into the daily life of the great majority of financially competent households of its community.

These are among the "reasons why" it is favored by experienced and successful advertisers.

presents the big new sport features of the year

TY COBB'S OWN LIFE STORY

BASEBALL'S STORY OF STORIES by Tyrus Raymond Cobb himself—whose batting, base running, fielding, and passion for success in the past 20 years have won him honors, notoriety, and leadership beyond all measure—and more individual records than any player in the history of baseball.

Cobb tells his story, strictly in the Ty Cobb manner—vividly, dramatically and complete to the last detail of every thrilling episode. He considers this a work of serious undertaking and an obligation to millions of baseball fans.

The records of Ty Cobb are known wherever there is sporting blood. They have been analyzed, emphasized and immortalized by all the celebrated writers in the realm of sport. But the personality, the character, the methods, the philosophy, the fire, the indomitable will, behind these glorious records has never been disclosed by the one person who holds the secret—TYRUS RAYMOND COBB himself.

"Hurry Up" Yost built plays around the forward pass 9 years before its use was permitted. He invented the "fake punt" formation before it was ever heard of at Harvard. He used "tackles back" three years ahead of any coach in America and devised many other famous plays—frequently accredited to others.

"Hurry Up" Yost's story will be popular in EVERY SECTION of the United States because he has coached players from every state and has coached teams to Championship in more states and sections than any man in football.

"The Way to Kill Evil Is to Report It" Fighting Texas Editor's Creed

Marcellus Foster's Own Story of Houston Chronicle's Many Successful Battles for Right—Ignored Threats, Intimidations and Boycotts in Relentless Campaigns Against Saloons, Gambling, Political Graft and Klan

By PHILIP SCHUYLER

"PUBLICITY is the greatest deterrent to evil in the world.

"Criminals who frequently don't dread the officers of the law or the courts shrink from publicity.

"Denunciatory editorials have no effect on those who are in the wrong.

"The way to kill evil is to report it, report it without censor."

In these four sentences Marcellus E. Foster, publisher of the Houston (Tex.) Chronicle summed up for me this week the story of his newspaper fights, which have gained for him the soubriquet of the "fighting editor of Texas."

Foster was in New York this week fresh from a victory over the Ku Klux Klan in Texas. For three years he has fought this secret society. It has been for him just one of a series of struggles since he started his newspaper in October 1921.

He has won all his fights. How?

By publicity; by ordering his reporters to write nothing but facts about existing evils; and by printing the facts uncensored.

"A newspaper owner must always stand for something militantly," was the way Foster put it.

"It is far too easy to turn your back when you see trouble coming.

"I'm the most peaceably inclined man in the world. Yet strange enough, it's true, I've been constantly fighting."

I paused to look carefully at the man who had made this last remark. Dressed in unobtrusive dark brown suit, brown tie showing from white stiff collar and above a vest unspangled by glittering chains or charms, he sat, one leg doubled under him, on a chintz-covered easy chair, while breezes from an open window in his room at the Vanderbilt Hotel, played with his curly graying hair. He was plainly editor. Mild greenish gray eyes that looked out through round spectacles clamped to his ears by black bands, had in them that thoughtful gaze of the constant observer of life. And he was plainly Texan. One knew this from the soft accent that padded his sentences. But, "fighting Texas editor,"—

I preferred to believe his own description of himself as "a most peaceable man," to be paradoxical—a peaceable fighting man.

"I never wore a gun in my life," he told me to contradict tales I had heard about him.

But then he admitted that back in his Texas home was a bushel-basket full of anonymous threatening letters. For two years Houston police placed a guard around that home, and furnished Foster with a personal bodyguard wherever he went.

"It wasn't through fear," explained Foster. "It was because I wanted to sleep soundly at night.

"And the bodyguard—that's rot. The only danger was that at every Klan meeting such hatred of me was preached that there always was a possibility that some poor fanatic might take it upon himself to put me suddenly out of business."

A Peaceable Fighting Man—M. E. FOSTER

Foster's story is romance, well worth recording, and, because this latest Klan fight is not the only peak, but one of many peaks in his career, it is best, I think, to go back 23 years for the opening chapter. Much of the story will be in the fighting editor's own words as he told it to me, seated in a chintz easy chair before an open window of a New York hotel.

"Twenty-three years ago this coming October," he began, "we started the Chronicle and began our first fight. We opposed the existing city administration and won."

This victory put the Chronicle's opposition in the Houston evening field out of business and gave the youthful newspaper its membership in the Associated Press.

"At this time," Foster continued, saloons were numerous along all Houston streets and there were a legion of open gambling dens. Gambling in those days, along with the red light district, was considered a necessary evil.

"Well, we began our fight against gambling. Immediately a committee of advertisers came to our office and protested. Gambling, said they, meant easy flow of money by which all trade was benefited.

"Winners give much of their gains to women, they argued, who spend it for fine clothes. Why should you, Marcellus Foster, try to reform a world-old evil, when you should be spending your time working for the best business interests of the town.

"To put it briefly, it was one hell of a fight. There were threats and intimidations, but we put gambling out of business, and the community prospered.

"Next we fought Senator Joe Bailey. This is a story all newspaper men know. The Senator is now our friend fighting with us against the Klan. We were the first newspaper in the country to wage war against him. Many took up the fight after us. When we first started, he was very popular, he was worshipped and loved by the people of Texas. That made the fight harder. But we won.

"The fight for state prohibition followed. This lasted for years. Drinking in our frontier State was considered a personal liberty not to be violated.

"By the majority, our stand was considered a crime. Business men came to me with sorry tales.

"'Why, Mr. Foster?, they ejaculated! 'Do you want to see a lot of vacant stores along Houston's streets? What will take the place of the saloon? You will have our best buildings inhabited only by bats and owls. Do you realize what you are doing?'

"They were perfectly sincere in their beliefs. They fought me for years. All I did was to give publicity to drunkenness. Print facts about the saloons. It took a long time to educate Texans to state prohibition. But we finally won.

"With all the fights we have ever had, against individuals or for principles, we have never had anything to equal our fight against the Klan", Foster continued.

"From the beginning, I instinctively felt the Klan was in the wrong. A society preaching race hatred and religious intolerance should not be allowed to exist, I believed.

"When I began fighting, I didn't realize the Klan was as strong as it was in Texas. This was 3 years ago.

"I never thought of the cost, whether the fight I had entered would result in financial gain or loss. I can't think in dollars and cents when I start fighting.

"The Klan began plans to boycott me, using intimidation, threats, and character assasination. They used all the weapons of a man who works in secret. They cowered in the dark. They never fought in the open.

"They couldn't do much harm in a big city. The Klan, for instance, could never make much headway in a city like New York.

"What did they do, then? They went out into the country places. The Klan has special appeal to people in small towns. There they have few means of entertainment. They have their churches Sunday; their town meetings; baseball on the vacant lot.

"A Klan agent, therefore, would go

PUBLISHERS REFUSE AGENCY PROPOSAL TO CHARGE FOR ELECTROTYPES

Armstrong's Plan to Supply Victor Copy in Layout or Plates to Be Paid for by Papers Viewed as Attempted Rate Cut and Unbusinesslike

By ARTHUR ROBB

DISAPPROVAL is the general attitude of publishers who have expressed opinions to EDITOR & PUBLISHER on the proposal of the F. Wallace Armstrong Agency of Philadelphia to charge newspapers for electrotypes of the Victor Talking Machine advertising, as the alternative to having the copy set in each newspaper's office. For many years past the Victor copy has been distributed in mat form, and the agency's decision to change the custom was announced last week in a circular letter.

Only one of the score of newspaper executives whose comments were sought by EDITOR & PUBLISHER agreed to the agency's payment proposition. A small city publisher agreed to pay the $1.25 per plate that the agency named as its price. This publisher, whose facilities are no more than adequate to get out his average issue with the usual run of plate copy, feared the possibility of error and consequent loss of income if his small force had to set in a rush the 800-line Victor advertising.

Others, possibly better equipped mechanically and more mindful of the effect that the Armstrong idea would have as a precedent, refused the offer of plates. Some of them pointed out that an increase in national advertising rates was certain if other advertisers followed the Victor Company's example and passed along to the newspapers the expense of setting their copy. Rates for national advertising are based by small city newspapers on the assumption that this copy is generally supplied in mat or plate form, the majority of their rate cards quoting an additional charge for composition.

Whether the Victor Company or its agency would pay this charge is questioned by some publishers. They point out that this account, which has run 800 lines weekly with occasional full pages, as a general thing has obtained preferred position without payment of any premium. This has been especially true in the smaller cities where competition is keen and the advertiser plays one publisher against another.

Another question that has been raised by the small publishers is whether the agency will insist on faithful reproduction of typography and 100 per cent accuracy in spelling and punctuation, refusing payment if type style is not followed or if trifling errors occur. These publishers also wonder whether they can collect payment for full space used if it is found impossible to set the advertising in the space ordered. All of the questions in this category touch vital spots of small papers and arise from the idea that copy may arrive on the day of publication or corrected proofs reach the office near press-time when available men and machines may not be able to give it needed attention.

Realization appears general among newspaper men that acceptance of the agency's idea of selling plates looks like a rate-cutting plan and might involve reorganization of the entire scheme of national advertising in newspapers.

One publisher, whose rate of 3 cents a line on Victor copy is common enough to make his calculation of general interest, tells EDITOR & PUBLISHER he could not afford to carry national advertising at present rates if compelled to pay for plates, or if the bulk of national advertising comes into his composing room in layout form. At his card rate of 3 cents, the gross revenue from Victor advertising approximates $1,600 a year. Over $400 of this never reaches his cash drawer, being deducted as commissions by the agency and special representative. If the copy comes in plates, the agency, according to its 1923 schedule in this paper, would deduct almost $70 additional—pretty close to 6 per cent of the net from the advertising—and he is also one of the unfortunate legion of publishers compelled by the typographical union laws to reset plat or mat advertising. He can see no profit at all at his present rate if the Armstrong idea prevails.

This conclusion is echoed by another publisher who says that his national rate is based on the fact that 90 to 95 per cent of this advertising arrives in mats or plate and that acceptance of the idea by many national advertisers would materially increase composition costs and eventually force higher advertising rates.

"This newspaper will not pay F. Wallace Armstrong nor any other agency for electrotypes or mats used in connection with accounts placed by agencies," says a Western advertising manager. "To do so would establish a dangerous precedent and involve newspapers treating advertising agencies impartially in agreements to handle all national accounts on this basis, adding several hundred dollars per month to the cost of handling national advertising on large newspapers. This would result in increased national rates and involve newspapers in endless controversy. If insisted upon, we will give any agency office service in setting copy, following layout as nearly as possible, but we will not make cuts without regular engraver's charge, nor be responsible for correctness of copy unless protected by O. K. proof from the agency prior to insertion of the advertisement."

"We will set Victor copy, giving them best possible service, naturally using only type faces that we have in the shop," says a Southern publisher. "If Victor furnishes copy in time, we will follow instructions, render proofs, and make corrections. If Victor gives us last-minute rush, they must accept that type of service, and assume responsibility for varying typographical effects. We will not buy mats or plates, just as we do not make free cuts for any advertiser. In our opinion, this request threatens reorganization of the entire national advertising rate situation."

"We have declined the Victor proposition to pay for electrotypes, advising that we would set copy if desired," states another Western publisher. "We would rather set the matter at our own expense than submit to an attempt to unload an unjust charge of this nature on us."

DENOUNCED IN OHIO

Select List Members Won't Pay for Electros, Meeting Decides

The Ohio Select List, meeting August 18 at Columbus, decided that its members would not pay advertisers for copy in plate form. Members were instructed by the meeting to notify advertisers and agencies that copy would be accepted in layout form, even at greater cost to the publishers than the price asked for plates. The proposal of this nature by F. Wallace Armstrong on the Victor Phonograph advertising was considered decidedly unfair and unbusinesslike.

PENNSYLVANIA DAILY SOLD

Monongahela Republican Passes from Hazzard Family to Local Men

The Monongahela (Pa.) Republican, for many years owned and controlled by the Hazzard family, has been sold to Claude E. Towner and R. H. Robinson, both of Monongahela, who will assume management Oct. 1.

The Republican was established in 1846, and in 1850 the paper was taken over by T. R. Hazzard. Since that time it has been directed by a member of the Hazzard family, the last owner being Miss Harriet Hazzard, inheriting the publication when her mother passed away 2 years ago.

LOUISVILLE PUBLISHER MARRIES

Judge Bingham, Owner Courier-Journal and Times, Takes Third Wife

Judge Robert W. Bingham, publisher of the Louisville (Ky.) Courier-Journal and Louisville Times, was married to Mrs. Byron Hilliard, also of Louisville, in London, England, Aug. 20.

The Canon of St. Margaret's and the Rt. Rev. Charles E. Woodcock of Kentucky performed the ceremony under a special license from the Archbishop of Canterbury.

Judge Bingham purchased the Courier-Journal and the Times in 1918 for a consideration said to approximate $1,000,000.

This is Judge Bingham's third marriage. His first wife was Miss Miller of Louisville. She was killed in an automobile accident. His second wife was the widow of Henry M. Flagler. She died almost a year after the marriage and left the Judge $5,000,000, with which he acquired the newspaper and other properties.

Daily Planning Fair Exhibit

The first extensive newspaper exhibit ever arranged by an Iowa daily will be on display by the Des Moines Register and Tribune at the Iowa State Fair at Des Moines the latter part of August. The exhibit includes a linotype as well as other machinery, which will show laymen the making of a metropolitan newspaper. One portion of the booth will resemble the city desk and news room of a large daily and will give the visitors an opportunity to see how news is gathered and prepared for publication. Several originals of cartoons by J. N. Darling, Register cartoonist, will be on display, including the cartoon which won the Pulitzer prize.

THE WAY TO KILL EVIL IS TO REPORT IT—FOSTER

into a small Texas town. 'I am going to organize you,' he would say, 'for the good of your town. We must protect our race and our religions. We must see that the law is upheld.

"'We must see that the law is upheld and crime prevented. I will appoint you Kleagle, you Grand Cyclops, and so forth. And you will all have lots of fun.'

"It was nothing but a Ponzi scheme, but the people fell for it. They loved to act as censors. This censorship grew from tar and feathering to crimes of flogging, and actual mutilation of bodies, and murder.

"We reported all these outrages fully, and last year such lawlessness as this ended in Texas.

"The Chronicle started the fight, stuck to it, and never has stopped.

"When we began the fight on the Klan we found that denunciatory editorials had little effect. We tried editorial sarcasm and ridicule with little more success.

"What killed the Klan was our reporting of every meeting they held verbatim, without censor. If a prominent citizen attended we printed his name, whether or not he was an advertiser. If a well known minister delivered a talk to Klansmen we told it. We used no condemnation.

"A Klansman would address a meeting saying there was a certain Jew's store which was being patronized by a Protestant family and they ought to go to a Klan store, and we would print just what he said.

"They did everything to keep us from reporting their meetings. Of course only Klansmen could attend. We had to employ a Klan reporter. The way I got hold of my Klan reporter was a matter of luck.

"A young man came to me one day, told me a hard luck story, about how he was out of work and his wife was about to have a baby. He wanted to borrow $200.

"'Why did you come to me?', I asked.

"He told me he didn't know, except that he had heard that I was sometimes generous.

"I didn't know whether he was a crook or not, but I took a chance and lent him the money. A few days later he came to me, told me he was a member of the Klan, and said he had asked them for help, that they had refused, and now he was willing to tell me all the secrets of the society.

"'I don't care about the secrets,' I told him. 'But I will give you a job on the Chronicle as a reporter at a regular weekly salary to report all Klan meetings.' He agreed.

"The Klan early determined to find out who was responsible for the columns of Klan stories, which began appearing regularly in the Chronicle. Thirty members were under suspicion. One evening they singled out these 30 one by one and gave them special work to do at a separate meeting of their own.

"If the Chronicle hasn't its regular story, they reasoned, we will get our man.

"The Chronicle reporter was one of the 30. He wrote the story of the special meeting of the thirty suspects and told us how to get the story of the regular meeting, and we appeared with our Klan publicity as usual.

"And so the Klan has been defeated in Texas. Just as sure as I am sitting here now, Mrs. James Ferguson, the anti-Klan candidate will be nominated for governor on Saturday, and the nomination in Texas is the equivalent of election.

"We have won our latest and biggest fight."

Foster, a modest man, found he was in a hurry and must rush away to keep an appointment, when he was asked for the story of his own personal newspaper fight.

But in that story is as much romance as in his public career. Starting newspaper work as a reporter on the Houston Post at $10 a week, in 4 years he advanced to the position of managing editor.

When he was about 30 years old he bought some oil land "for a song" and made $5,000. With this amount, he began talking to his business friends, looking towards raising enough capital to start an evening newspaper in Houston. Finally he gathered together $25,000 and on Oct. 14, 1901, started the Houston Chronicle in the midst of the Houston oil boom.

In the beginning, this newspaper had only 2 typesetting machines and one old Cox duplex printing press. It was housed in a ramshackle wooden building.

But, as Foster says, he was "surrounded by a bunch of loyal fellows" and the Chronicle had grown and prospered until today it has one of the finest newspaper plants in the South and assets of more than $2,000,000.

Although still in a hurry to keep his appointment he paused a moment to conclude the interview.

"There is one point I want to make," he said. "I think things that hide in the dark, that shrink from the light, should be brought out into the open by the newspapers.

"If the newspapers cannot educate the people to follow the right, what on God's earth can?"

E. W. SCRIPPS, RETIRING, COUNSELS HIS SON

His Letter, Conferring Complete Control of Policies on Robert P. Scripps, Published By Latter After Editorial Endorsing La Follette, Approves Scripps-Howard Conduct of Properties

A REMARKABLE letter written by Edward W. Scripps, millionaire American newspaper builder to his son Robert P. Scripps was made public in all Scripps-Howard newspapers late last week.

ROBERT P. SCRIPPS

The letter, dated June 14, 1924, details the father's desires regarding the future editorial conduct of his newspapers, and news-gathering and news-disseminating agencies, which he turned over to his son and Roy W. Howard, 4 years ago.

It was made public by the son last week, following publication of an editorial written by him in all Scripps-Howard newspapers, endorsing the independent presidential candidacy of Robert M. La Follette.

Robert Scripps prefaced the letter by saying:

"The writing of that editorial was the most important work I have undertaken since the receipt from E. W. Scripps, the founder of this newspaper organization, of the following letter:

'Mr. Robert P. Scripps,

Present.

'Dear Son: A little over four years ago I turned over to you and Mr. Roy W. Howard the control of all my newspapers and news-gathering and news-disseminating agencies, directing you to act as editor-in-chief.

'I executed a power-of-attorney, appointing you to take full charge of my estate.

'I advised you to "go slow" in the matter of exercising control over the editorial direction of the institution until you should have become thoroughly acquainted with the personnel and until you should have had time to mature your own convictions with regard to public policies.

'Under yours and Howards' direction of the institution, its property value has greatly increased.

ROY W. HOWARD

'I am now past seventy, and have decided it will be better not only that I should cease active control, but to have any sort of influence over your activities.

'It is my opinion that the value of the properties over which you exercise control might well increase many fold if your chief aim were merely to cause increase in wealth.

'However, I repeat now what I told you when I first launched you in your career: That I would prefer that you should succeed in being in all things a gentleman, according to the real meaning of that word, than that you should vastly increase the money value of my estate. Being a gentleman, you cannot fail to devote your whole mind and energy to the service of the plain people who constitute the vast majority of the people of the United States.

'I have so arranged my affairs that beyond all doubt you will control my estate after my death, and hence control all of those newspapers which I had previously controlled—and perhaps many more—besides those news-gathering and news-disseminating associations which I built up.

"I belong to two past generations"—E. W. SCRIPPS

'I have turned over to you a property so large and so well organized that not only can you afford to do your full duty as a public servant, but you are and can be, continually, entirely free from any temptation to cater to any class of your fellow citizens for profit.

'You have not had nor should you at any time ever have any ambition to secure political or social eminence.

'I belong to two past generations. You belong to the present, and your duty is, I consider, toward the present and future generations. I cannot consider that you have any inclination or that you are going to be subject to any temptation to do anything other than your full duty toward the public of this and future generations. 'Affectionately,

EDWARD W. SCRIPPS'."

Iowa Dailies Taking Straw Vote

A dozen daily newspapers in the population centers of Iowa this week launched a straw-vote campaign to determine Iowa sentiment in the presidential campaign. Ballots will be obtained from all over the state and local and state-wide results published at intervals throughout the voting. The Iowa vote is conceded an important factor in the race and the newspapers poll will indicate to a large degree the attitude of the voters on the third party issue.

Business Manager of Nashville Banner Assumes Ownership of Clarksville Leaf-Chronicle—Puts Son in Charge

Edgar M. Foster, business manager of the Nashville (Tenn.) Banner, has purchased the Clarkesville (Tenn.) Leaf-Chronicle from Mrs. W. W. Barksdale who has managed the property since the death of her husband, March 8, 1922. M. Stratton Foster, Mr. Foster's son, has assumed active charge of the newspaper as publisher.

E. M. FOSTER

Mr. Foster has been business manager of the Banner for 30 years, and is considered one of the outstanding figures in Tennessee journalism.

Stratton Foster has been an engineer connected with the construction firm of Foster & Creighton. He is a graduate from the Vanderbilt University in the School of Engineering and the College of Arts.

Mrs. Barksdale made the following announcement in regard to the deal:

"It is impossible to express my feeling at this important step. The Leaf-Chronicle represents the life work of my late husband. I would no more think of putting it into unworthy hands than I would think of entrusting our son to unworthy teachers or advisors. The very fact that I decided to relinquish this paper into Mr. Foster's hands is evidence of my confidence in his ability to serve the people of Clarksville as they deserve to be served.

RECEIVER NAMED FOR INDIANAPOLIS PAPER

Ralph W. Douglass, former business manager of the Indianapolis School Board, has been appointed receiver for the Indianapolis Commercial and Daily American.

The appointment was asked in a suit filed by the Enquirer Printing Company, which is printing the paper under contract. It was alleged that the newspaper was indebted to the Enquirer Company in the amount of $80,067.39, for which amount notes were given, and that three notes of $2,000 each are now due and unpaid. It was further charged that the defendant newspaper was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $9,353.70 for current printing, of which amount more than $7,000 is due and unpaid, and that the defendant was indebted to others, not named, in the sum of $11,000.

The complaint asserted that the paper is now being published at a loss each month and that the appointment of a receiver was necessary to conserve the assets of the company and to insure payment to the creditors.

Robert A. Butler, president of the Commercial, said that some indebtedness to the Enquirer company is now in dispute, but that the suit was a "surprise," as the dispute had been of an amicable nature. He said that he did not know that the suit had been filed.

The newspaper is published on the machinery of the Enquirer company at a rental which is estimated on the volume of work done, on the machinery, Butler said, and there has been a dispute for some time in regard to the amount to be charged. Other indebtedness of the Commercial is covered, Butler said.

FORESEES CHEAPER PAPER

Lord Beaverbrook Says Canadian Mills Are Charging Too Much

Reduction in the price of newsprint was predicted by Lord Beaverbrook, proprietor of the London Daily Express, when he was interviewed by Montreal newspaper men last week.

"Canadian firms are getting too high a price for newsprint at present and the price is sure to come down," the Canadian-British publisher is quoted as saying.

"By this time next year it will not be so high as it is today.

"I have just visited at Bathurst, N. B., a most compact newsprint plant owned by Mr. Angus McLean, and I was delighted to see that Canada's premier industry is being developed so well in my native province.

"Newsprint is of very great importance to Canada. Lord Rothermere is one of the largest newsprint consumers in the world, and uses more than 100,000 tons a year. If he bought all of it in Canada he would be one of the biggest customers Canada has. I am told that Lord Rothermere is about to build a new newsprint mill on the St. Lawrence above Quebec.

"Sir William Price is transforming the Saguenay and I am told that before long he will have an output of 1,000 tons of newsprint a day. This is enough to supply Lord Rothermere and two others like him."

NEW ARBITRATION PACT SOUGHT BY LYNCH

President-Elect Asks I. T. U. Not to Hamper Him in Negotiations With A.N.P.A. and Gets a Free Hand

Renewed efforts will be made by the International Typographical Union, after James M. Lynch takes office as president, to obtain a new arbitration contract with the American Newspaper Publishers Association. This is indicated by an address made by President-elect Lynch before the annual I. T. U. convention in Toronto last week, opposing adoption of an amendment to the union laws providing that such an agreement must be approved by a referendum of the union membership, that it must, in effect, exempt I. T. U. law from arbitration, and that local unions need not be bound to compulsory arbitration.

The amendment was withdrawn following Mr. Lynch's address, in which he stated that "it would hamstring any effort to negotiate an arbitration agreement." He declared that he was willing to undertake new negotiations for an agreement satisfactory to the union to take the place of the one which expired three years ago. Since then committees of the A. N. P. A. and I. T. U. have deadlocked on the demand, reiterated by several A. N. P. A. conventions, that no agreement be made unless the union waived its claim that its laws were not subject to arbitration.

Mr. Lynch declared that the union had given hostile employers a new weapon by the resolution adopted Aug. 15 providing that the Executive Council should not mandate a subordinate union to accept a reduction in wages.

Concern was evident in the minds of many delegates because the union has failed to regain ground it lost incidental to the fight for the 44-hour week, notably in the South and more lately in the Pacific Northwest.

Nashville delegates prayed the convention for international union assistance in reorganizing its territory, in which most of the large commercial shops are now non-union. The Southeastern Typothetæ, by adopting Nashville as headquarters, have a strategic advantage which threatens to take the entire territory from control of the I. T. U., the convention was told. Approval was given to a resolution that Nashville be accorded special consideration in a general reorganization that the union plans during the coming year.

Another region where I. T. U. fences need mending is in the neighborhood of Seattle. It was charged that the recent strike of newspaper printers on the Post-Intelligencer is being used by employing printers as a wedge to place the Pacific Northwest printing industry on a non-union basis. The P.-I. office had been union for 50 years, and the strike was called in May after failure of negotiations over a five-month period. The convention approved a report recommending assistance to the strikers.

Disapproval was the fate of proposals that the union establish a bank like that of the locomotive engineers' brotherhood, and that it give its sanction to the formation of a labor party.

LINEAGE CURVE RISING

Gains by Papers Without Sunday Editions Show July Loss Is Only Apparent

Newspaper advertising in the country's large cities is not on the downward trend, despite the apparent loss shown in the July statistics compiled by the New York Evening Post Statistical Department. The figures, which cover 138 newspapers in 30 cities, show a total of 91,578,618 lines for July, 1924, against 98,288,433 lines in July, 1923, the decrease of 6,709,815 lines being practically all in the Sunday issues, of which July, 1923, had five against four this year.

Of the 39 papers listed as showing gains for the month, 29 are evening papers which have no Sunday edition and were therefore unaffected by the quarterly vagary of the calendar.

Another factor in the decrease is the large number of consolidations and the several new papers for which 1924-1923 comparisons cannot now be made. The lineage of the combined papers in every instance is considerably less than was that of the individual journals a year ago, and the new papers have not yet attained volume enough to overcome that loss, most of which arises from duplicate schedules.

The July figures follow:

	1924	1923	Loss
New York	9,919,374	10,751,018	831,644
Chicago	5,166,507	5,223,255	56,748
Philadelphia	5,445,409	5,593,212	147,803
Detroit	3,737,230	4,051,978	314,748
Cleveland	2,946,075	3,448,425	503,350
St. Louis	2,961,620	3,093,440	131,820
Boston	4,304,125	4,324,772	20,647
Baltimore	3,260,980	3,683,556	422,576

A. A. C. W. AT HOUSTON MAY 17-21, 1925

Executive Committee Will Fix Definite Dates Next Month, and Spring Meeting Is Favored—East May Go by Ship

Convention sessions of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World at Houston next year will probably begin May 17 and continue to May 21, it was learned at A. A. C. W. headquarters this week. The dates will be definitely fixed at the September meeting of the executive committee, and approval of these mentioned is likely, as Houston wants the meeting held during its most pleasant seasons of late Spring or early Fall, and the A. A. C. W. chiefs prefer a Spring meeting.

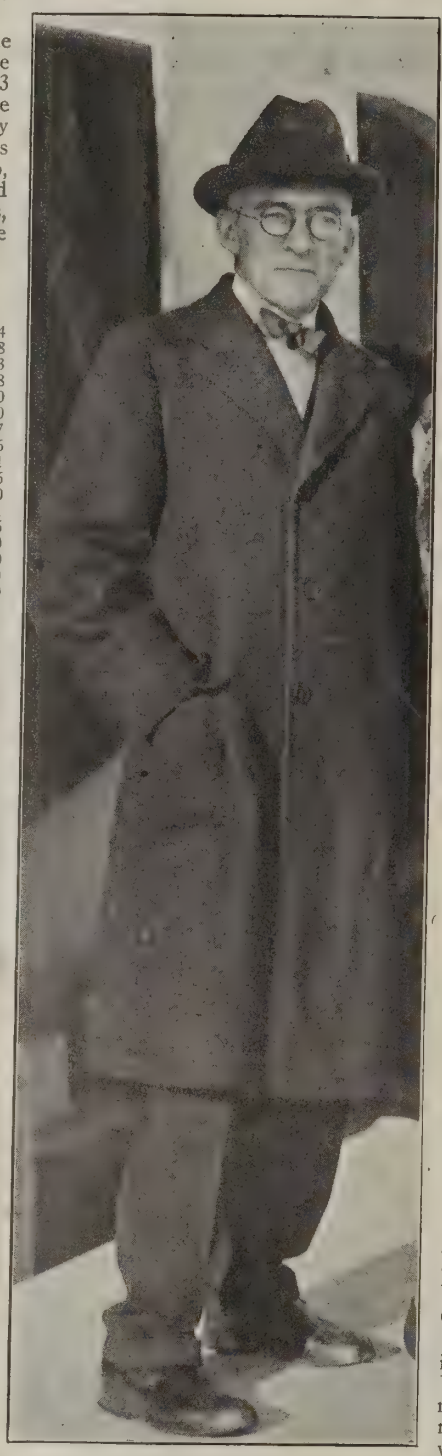
Headquarters is also considering transportation of Eastern delegates to Houston by water. Preliminary investigations are being made as to the possibility of chartering a ship to touch at several ports en route to the convention city and approval of the idea is general among the people who enjoyed the voyage to London.

Election of the National Advertising Commission chairman has not yet been held, the London meeting adjourning for lack of a quorum until the regular October session in Chicago. Upon election, the commission chairman automatically becomes a member of the executive committee. Members of this committee now serving are:

President Lou E. Holland, Kansas City.

Secretary-Treasurer Jesse H. Neal, New York.

Charles Henry Mackintosh, Chicago, past president.



Carl F. G. Meyer, St. Louis, president of the St. Louis Advertising Club.

Ethel B. Scully, Milwaukee, elected by the women at London.

E. T. Meredith, Des Moines, elected by sustaining members.

W. Frank McClure, Chicago, chairman of the National Advertising Commission.

PROMOTED

James H. Furay gets a title to decorate the job which he has built since the war made foreign news a big element in the daily newspaper menu. This picture shows him starting on one of his occasional visits to other lands.

GRIFFITH NOW PUBLISHER

Succeeds C. C. Rosewater on Seattle Post-Intelligencer

E. C. Griffith, general manager of the Seattle (Wash.) Post-Intelligencer since last February, has been appointed publisher to succeed C. C. Rosewater.

Before coming to Seattle he was director of advertising for the Washington (D. C.) Evening Times and Morning Herald, Hearst publications.

Griffith began his newspaper work on the Fargo (N. D.) Argus as a reporter. About 15 years ago he entered the advertising department of the Minneapolis Tribune. Later he served on the Grand Forks (N. D.) Times-Herald, and Chicago Daily News. After leaving the News he was appointed Western manager of O'Mera & Ormsbee, Inc., publishers' representatives. From this position he advanced to vice-president and Western manager of the Dorrance Sullivan Company, which he left to join the Washington Hearst papers.

U. P. PROMOTES FURAY TO VICE-PRESIDENCY

Advancement of Foreign Editor Follows Wide Expansion of Associations Service Abroad—Six Years With Organization

James H. Furay has been elected vice-president in charge of foreign services of the United Press Associations, it was formally announced this week.

For the past 6 years he has been United Press foreign editor, with headquarters in New York.

His advancement marks the latest chapter in a story of foreign expansion on the part of the United Press, which has progressed coincident with Furay's service.

During the last 6 years many new foreign bureaus have been established and the personnel of all U. P. foreign bureaus has been more than tripled. The United Press now serves approximately 90 newspapers in foreign countries, including the South American republics, China, Japan, Hawaii, Spain and Germany.

When Furay came to New York in 1918 the United Press foreign department numbered only 2 men, where it now numbers 8. Where there were only 2 in Brazil in 1918 there are now 14, and in London 5, now 15.

Mr. Furay was born in Omaha in 1879, and in 1899 started his newspaper work on the Omaha Daily News, joining that newspaper for its first issue. He became telegraph editor, in which position he remained for 8 months.

From Omaha Furay went to St. Paul, joining the St. Paul News with its first issue. Later he worked on the Des Moines News as telegraph and make-up editor, before going to the Chicago American as librarian.

Leaving the American for the old Inter-Ocean copy desk Furay spent some further time in Chicago before he moved to Indianapolis, where, as copy-reader, state editor, telegraph editor, night editor and Sunday editor successively of the Indianapolis Star, he remained 2 years.

In 1905, he joined the staff of the Cleveland Press, and became managing editor after one year. He remained in this position 18 months, then joined the United Press as manager of its central division at Chicago in 1908.

From 1908 until 1910 Furay remained in Chicago. He was in charge of the United Press bureau at Denver for the next 4 years, and from 1915 to 1918 was manager of the Pacific Coast Division, with headquarters at San Francisco.

In 1918 he came to New York to become foreign editor, taking over a department which supplied services to newspapers in South America, and had exchange arrangements with one or two outside agencies.

Furay is one of the three oldest "Unipressers" in point of continuous service, his record being exceeded by Ed L. Keen, general European manager, and E. T. Conkle, superintendent of bureaus.

Keen remains as vice-president and general European manager, and J. I. Miller continues as vice-president in charge of South American news.

MORE FUN ON SMALL DAILIES SAYS PHILLIPS

New York Sun Columnist Advises Young Writers to Take 6 Years' Experience Before Attempting Metropolitan Journalism—How He Broke Into Gotham Field

By PHILIP SCHUYLER

SATISFACTION, enjoyment, real pleasures of life—where are these found in the newspaper profession?

In the small city newspaper office, according to H. I. Phillips, sparkling humorist, conductor of the "Sun Dial," for the New York Sun, a column widely syndicated by Associated Newspapers as "The Once-Over."

Phillips this week, upon orders from the writer, wandered back to his cub reporter days on the New Haven (Conn.) Register, where, he says, he had "most fun," long before he broke into the metropolitan field and won for himself more than a "Park Row reputation" by his witty pen.

Only 36 now, Phillips, talking of yesterday, is no wornout work horse, full of rosy dreams of a colt's clover pasture. He has a brilliant future still ahead of him. He went to the top in a small city; he is "sitting pretty" in New York today. What he has to say, therefore, about the two distinct journalistic fields is packed with interest.

The writer called on him at his low ceilinged office in the Sun building with a definite thought in mind. New York managing editors and city editors report they are being besieged daily by young men willing "to do anything" to get a start as newspaper men. It has been estimated that the number of news writers out of work mounts to high hundreds in Manhattan. They would learn much from the Phillips' book.

"Well," he qualified at the start, "I have only my own experience as basis for opinion."

That was quite sufficient.

"I would advise young men starting out to stick to a small city for 6 years at least, before leaving the kindly place for a metropolitan career," he continued.

"He will obtain far more experience, and will have decidedly much more fun to the bargain.

"Small city experience is the best in the world. But too many fellows are content there too long. It is a comfortable life. Leaving it one feels he is kicking over a basket of glass.

"Six years is enough. To stay much longer usually means becoming the long-bearded 'oldest member of the staff.' With ambition, a man should have learned enough in this time to find success in New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, San Francisco, or any of the larger fields.

"But once in the larger field, I think he will find his gain is not without its loss.

"There is far more real fun on a newspaper in a city the size of New Haven. There is more Bohemian spirit in the life. All on the paper are friends, working for one another, and the newspaper. There are poker games to play after the paper goes to press, free tickets to shows, dances, clam bakes. It is like school, when students, after studying together, go out and play together.

"Hours, of course, are long. They are long in New York, too. But you get to know all the 'big bugs' in the small web. You are respected, looked up to, which is no small satisfaction to any man.

"To be sure, salaries seem like jokes to the big boy in the city. But the small roll goes farther, much farther.

"Why, 12 years ago, when automobiles were none too common I, as reporter on the Register, owned my second-hand car. And a lot of fun and trouble it gave me, too. After coming to New York, it was 4 long years before I could afford an automobile, even with much more pay.

"In New Haven, I owned a 30-foot sloop, too. I belonged to the yacht club. That cost me about $2 a year."

Phillips tilted back his chair. He was not in New York now. He was back really reliving yesteryears.

"And breaking into New York—was that hard?" he was prompted.

"Not as hard as it is painted, as far as I was concerned," he replied, suddenly recalled a step or two in advance of his story. "I had always thought of New York managing editors and city editors as hardboiled roughnecks. But I never got anything but a helping hand from them—except—"

He joined the N. H. Y. C.—did H. I. PHILLIPS

But the Phillips' story reads so like a romance, it is better told in sequence. Very much like Percy B. S. Ray in the now old-fashioned novel "The World of Chance" by W. D. Howells, Phillips built up a home town reputation and offered it to New York.

Nineteen years ago, Harry Irving Phillips, then 17, was at high school in New Haven. He was already one of the wage earners in his family. After school he climbed up into the driver's seat of a delivery wagon, and peddled the wares of Charley Atwood, wholesale candy dealer.

This sort of business didn't suit Harry Irving one little but. He would graduate that year and he was already building phantasies of later life as a distinguished artist. He could write too. Someday he would be an author and illustrate his own books.

At school he drew cartoons of the most popular girl, of the football star, of his teacher, and wrote funny captions under them.

"You oughter draw for the newspapers," advised admiring school friends.

Phillips thought them right, Consequently, the New Haven Register building facinated him a great deal. He drove his delivery wagon out of his way, making rounds through the elm shaded streets of the university city, to pass it by.

Like Theodore Dreiser a few years before him in Chicago, Phillips was wondering how he could become a newspaper man, a position which seemed quite impossibly glorified.

Then came opportunity and its knock resembled closely the one heard by Dreiser. An advertisement in the Register read:

"Wanted: a young man to learn the newspaper business. Apply to managing editor, New Haven Register."

Phillips applied immediately. Clarence Snevely Thompson, managing editor, told him to report the next day. He was to be paid $7 a week.

For a year Phillips learned newspapering and more in the stench of streets near the docks, covering the "water front beat." It all began very tamely. As his first assignment, he was sent to cover the bean supper given in Dr. Watson Phillips' church, in the fashionable west end. But afterward came labor troubles, gun fights, knife play and thrills along the water front.

At the end of this year, Phillips received his first raise in pay. He was been earned by him "unsolicited." Now he was a real newspaper man. He was assigned to the police beat.

given $2 a week more, with a letter from his boss saying that the increase had

"Our salaries," joked staff members among themselves, "are from $4 to $8 and we work from 8 o'clock to 4, seven days a week."

A few years later, Phillips started his first column, and the first ever run by the Register. It was given the name of the "Elm City Clarion," and parodied news events in the manner of the "Bingville Bugle."

He drew weekly cartoons, too, of Yale athletic activities. These cartoons, drawn when Phillips was only about 19, now hang in the Yale University Athletic Association Building in New Haven.

About this time the New Haven jail caught fire. It was such a blaze and the Register staff was so small, that even the managing editor and city editor left their desks to cover it. Phillips, who had done nothing but the police beat, the waterfront beat and his column, was told how to make a paragraph mark, and assigned to sit in and edit copy.

Phillips had been 5 years with the Register, when his managing editor resigned. Periodically he had been discontented and had written New York editors unsuccessfully for work.

"Humpf," grunted Hugh Kennedy, the Register's business manager, "You talk of going to New York. You're no good. You know nothing about the business yet. You wouldn't have the nerve to knock at the door of a New York newspaper. We are going to make you managing editor of the Register. You go back upstairs now and take that desk."

Phillips did. Editing copy was one of the big jobs of the managing editor on the Register of that day. He knew little about it. But, although he was scared stiff for a while, he kept the job for 6 years. As managing editor he was making $40 a week. And he handled some big stories, too—the Titanic disaster, and the start of the World War.

By July 1917, however, Phillips had had enough of the satisfaction and fun of the small city job. He sent out a round of letters to New York editors, and got one reply from the managing editor of the New York Tribune. This Tribune reply offered him work on the copy desk at $60 a week. Phillips gave two weeks' notice and accepted.

With his wife, he moved to New York and took rooms in a house opposite a cemetery in Jersey City. He was such a greenhorn at the time that, wishing to give his wife a treat, he took her one week-end to the Brighton Beach Hotel. The name sounded grand. But they had a terrible time.

He was frankly a "bust" on the Tribune. After 3 months, he received that courteous note telling him kindly that his work was not all that was desired, and found himself pounding New York pavements.

Finally, he got another job on the copy desk of the New York Globe. It was at the end of the war. He drew a cartoon around the idea "How to Punish the Kaiser," and sent it to the New York World. The next day it appeared on 5 columns of the second page of that newspaper.

That was something like. He got to work in earnest now, at home, after long hours on the Globe copy desk. He drew 9 cartoons and rushed them to the World. All came back.

Well, there was still writing left. Not much chance on a copy desk, one might think. Phillips thought differently He read the department "To-night's Events" and made a point of attending the one that sounded most unusual or funny. Going home afterwards, he would draw a cartoon and write a parody account of what took place. The Globe began using these regularly paying him space rates, with $5 for each cartoon.

In the spring of 1919, Phillips got the column bug again. He wrote a sample between heads one day on the copy desk,

INACCURACIES CUT DOWN BY GIVING BOTH SIDES OF EVERY STORY

Investigate Every Charge of Error and Do Not Hesitate to Print Corrections Says White of World's Accuracy Bureau

HOW can newspaper inaccuracies be avoided?

With this thought in mind, I called this week on Isaac Deforest White, director of the New York World's Bureau of Accuracy and Fair Play.

ISAAC D. WHITE

Mr. White is confident newspapers of today, despite the increased speed of their production, are more accurate than ever before. But errors persist where they might be avoided.

For more than 10 years Mr. White has conducted the Accuracy and Fair Play Bureau, which, now an old story to men in journalism, has proved its worth, has been copied extensively, and everyday continues its work of maintaining the position of the World as a newspaper whose "real influence must be measured by the number of readers who believe in it."

Previous to taking over the bureau, Mr. White had among other activities successfully conducted the Elmira Reformatory investigation for the World, and as head of the same newspaper's legal department, had made a special study of the laws on libel.

After we had gone over the carefully indexed bureau files, listing complaints, the written explanation by the reporter at fault, required by the bureau, the published correction and the letter of thanks from the injured victim, which usually follows, Mr. White, after deliberation, offered these rules for avoiding error:

"I—Accuracy and fair play, synonymous with truth and justice, sum up the law of libel, just as the Golden Rule embodies the Ten Commandments. Be accurate and fair.

"II—Get both sides of every story. Failure to do this is the commonest cause of inaccuracies in newspapers.

"III—Avoid 'trial-by-newspaper.'

"IV—Rapid-fire evening newspapers are responsible to a large degree for the reputation for inaccuracy. Evening newspaper workers, particularly telephone reporters and re-write men, must be alert to the exceptional hazard involved in their work and the consequent necessity of exercising exceptional care.

"V—To publish an article affecting the reputation of a person without giving him an opportunity to deny or explain is to convict him without a hearing. It is like shooting from ambush.

"VI—Mistakes in pictures cause many libels. A picture should not be published unless fully identified. The name on a picture by itself proves nothing. Many names are common to different persons. In identifying pictures to avoid mistakes supplement the name with information as to occupation, social or official position or any other details that will prevent error.

"VII—Investigate all complaints of unfairness and inaccuracy, and if the investigation justifys it, print a correction.

"VIII—Exercise care and judgment in using biographical department clippings. They may contain errors and libels. Persons accused may have been later vindicated. When in doubt investigate before rewriting. If a reputable person has lived down a bad past don't dig it up without just and reasonable grounds.

"IX—A reporter responsible for an error should furnish his editor with a written explanation.

"X—The penalty for chronic carelessness and deliberate 'faking' should be dismissal."

Study of the files had disclosed a material decrease in the past ten years in the number of inaccuracies complained of, and seemed to prove that a frank admission of guilt on the part of a newspaper and a printed correction tended rather to increase friendship towards and faith in a newspaper rather than detracting from it.

For an example, he turned back in the files to 1921, when a World reporter's interview with Hamilton Holt, then editor of the Independent, in regard to a phase of the conference on the Limitation of Armaments. It was a case where a story had been made out of informal conversation, which Holt had not supposed would be used for publication. The complaint was put up to the reporter, and it developed there had been a misunderstanding. Then Holt's letter was published.

"The whole affair was apparently a misunderstanding pure and simple," Mr. Holt later wrote Mr. White. "Permit me especially to congratulate the World on its fair play in the matter."

Another case seemed to reflect the present day reporter's aversion to using pencil and paper extensively in reporting an interview.

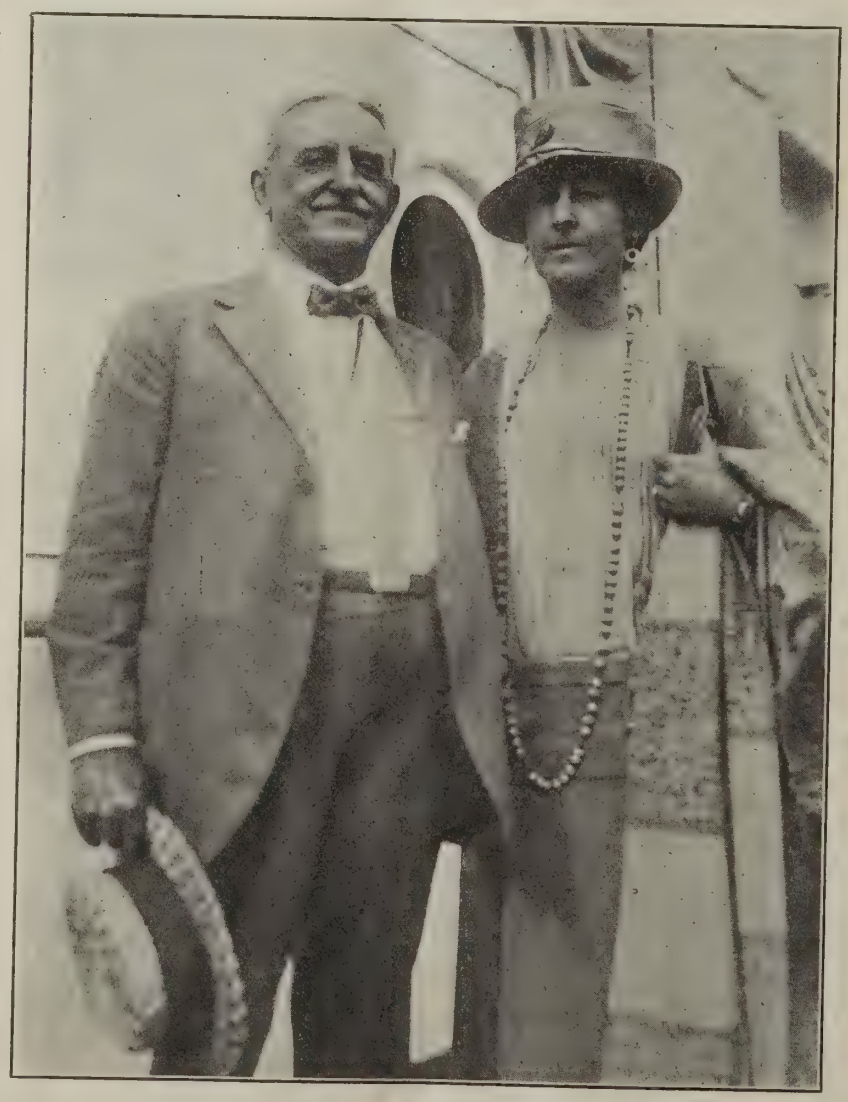
Sent to Oklahoma City to cover the Klan disturbance there last November, a reporter quoted Aldrich Blake as saying:

"I will say this frankly, if I had my choice of religions, the Roman Catholic is the very last religion I ever would embrace."

Blake immediately protested by letter, claiming that what he said was:

"I prefer any Protestant denomination to the Catholic denomination within the Christian religion."

Investigation and the reporter's written explanation justified the printing of a correction, which, sent to Blake, brought the following letter:



"The World is to be congratulated for this Bureau of Accuracy and Fair Play which it maintains, as it gives me a much more cordial feeling towards the press."

Reporters are not always the only ones in error. An editorial writer recently passed a slighting comment on the Investment Bankers Association. The association claimed the editorial writer must not be possessed of full facts regarding their organization. The World immediately sent a reporter down, who reported that such was the case. Thereupon the newspaper made arrangements with John W. Prentiss, the association president, to publish a series of two articles written by him, explaining the association's aims and ideals.

"That the World printed the two articles to correct an error in a previous editorial comment is all the more creditable," Mr. Prentiss declared in a speech to association members at a subsequent convention.

"The World not only performed a valuable public service, but it showed a highly laudable spirit in its quick willingness to correct an inadvertent and unintentional error."

FAR FROM THE PRESSROOM DIN

Irving I. Stone, mechanical superintendent of the Chicago Daily News, and Mrs. Stone, on their way to Europe last week.

Stories bought by a newspaper from outside sources sometimes contain errors which the newspaper cannot possibly avoid. The World, for instance, a short time ago was informed by Success Magazine of infringement of copyright in a regular daily feature article furnished by a prominent woman writer and syndicated to many other newspapers. In her explanation of the complaint, the woman writer declared that against her better judgment she had written her feature for one day by merely using a press clipping of an article which had previously appeared in Success Magazine, written by another and copyrighted.

The prompt action of the World in printing an apology prevented what might have developed into a suit for damages.

Texas Daily Plans New Home

A $12,000 home will be built immediately for the Palestine (Tex.) Daily Herald and the Anderson County Herald, it is announced by the owners and editors, W. M. and H. V. Hamilton of Palestine. New linotype machinery will be purchased.

Accepted As A.B.C. Applicant

Marysville (Cal.) Democrat has been accepted as an applicant for membership in the Audit Bureau of Circulations, the Bureau has announced. The Democrat recently installed United Press leased wire service.

MORE FUN ON SMALL DAILIES—PHILLIPS

and at night laid it on the desk of George T. Hughes, the city editor, without comment. Hughes said nothing. Two days later the column appeared as "The Globe Trotter," and Phillips was told that the publisher liked it, and he was to do it regularly, being paid space rates, and keeping up his copy desk job.

After a year, Bruce Bliven, managing editor of the Globe, brought the column to the attention of Associated Newspapers, and it was sent out to newspapers on trial. It made a hit, and quite suddenly Phillips found himself a columnist with growing reputation.

When the Globe was sold and combined with the Sun, Phillips had become so popular, that the World and the Associated Newspapers went to court to obtain his services. The latter won.

Now Phillips is not tied down by any regular hours. He can work at home, or at the Associated Newspapers office, or at the Sun.

"But I have been a newspaper man so long that I can't keep away from a newspaper office," Phillips told me.

"The printers think I'm 'old-womanly,' but I can't resist coming down early every morning to watch my column made up on the stones in the New York Sun composing room."

At the Sun office, therefore, you will find him almost any day, from 8 until 2 or 3 o'clock in the afternoon, his hat on the back of his head, a cigar in his mouth, and the floor around his desk strewn with the day's newspapers—H. I. Phillips, newspaper man.

Radio Company Launches Campaign

The Federal Telephone & Telegraph Company, Buffalo, has started an advertising campaign which will be conducted throughout the fall and winter on Federal Standard radio products. Although full pages are being used in national magazines at this time, newspaper advertising will be placed in metropolitan centers later in the season, according to Milo Gurney, advertising manager of the company.

New President for Blanchard Press

Ancel J. Brower has retired as president of the Blanchard Press, Inc., New York. He has been elected vice-president. He is succeeded as president by J. Cliff Blanchard.

PROFESSIONAL STATUS URGED FOR ADVERTISING

British Divine, After Watching Americans at Wembley, Calls It a Noble Career—Promise of Mutual Trade Insight Between Nations Was Fulfilled by Convention

By HERBERT C. RIDOUT
London Editor, EDITOR & PUBLISHER

THE International Advertising Convention at Wembley, England, differed from all the 19 great conventions that had preceded it in one vital matter. The advertising conventions up to 1923 left in their wake merely the problem of what the individual delegates, and, maybe, the cities of rendezvous, were going to get out of them.

The 1924 convention has left its own larger problems by its internationalism—what will America, Great Britain, France and each of the other countries having responsible delegates, what will they get out of it? America and other visiting countries will decide for themselves what benefit to their store of advertising knowledge they will derive from the Wembley convention.

What will Great Britain secure from the convention is the question that is already exciting interest on this side and in its answer, I think, will be found to justify completely the wisdom of the A. A. C. W. in accepting London's invitation.

It will take a few months, perhaps, to witness the materialization of some of the benefits from the applied knowledge and experiences gained by British delegates, but from the mass of aftermath pouring in upon me it is easy to see that Great Britain's business men have already learned some valuable lessons.

Perhaps one of the most striking features of the week of advertising was the treatment by the press of the country. Disappointment was certainly felt that some of the London dailies did not pay more attention to it; they treated it merely as a news story of the day, instead of a great re-awakening of trade opportunities. The one splendid exception was the London Daily Telegraph, whose treatment of it was a revelation. The six issues of the paper from July 12 to July 19 comprise an unofficial record of the proceedings given in a fashion that I believe no American paper has ever attempted. This was the press surprise of the convention, and but for that treatment there would have been no connected or coherent account available in our London newspapers. So far as the provinces were concerned, the newspapers may be said to have done their part, particularly those in Sheffield, Bradford, Liverpool and even Manchester.

The latter city, by the way, had a complaint against itself. Given a lead over a year ago by the munificent gift of $25,000 by Sir Edward Hulton, Manchester failed to support it. When during the ensuing twelve months it was subjected to examination by EDITOR & PUBLISHER'S special commissioner, the apathy of the city and its publishing and advertising interests was fully apparent. At the last moment the city awoke and made a frantic bid for representation in the convention; it is curious that the most diligent workers at the end were those who had turned down the convention idea hardest from the start. But it was too late. Glasgow, Edinburgh, Dublin and Belfast were visited by parties of 200 each to the Scottish and 100 each to the Irish cities. Manchester received a party of 60; the city had failed to capitalize its own importance.

But Lancashire, with Manchester as its great centre, has learned its lesson. J. Murray Allison, in the Manchester Daily Dispatch, said: "It is notorious that Lancashire lags in advertising." The city was even eclipsed at Wembley by a smaller Lancashire town, Salford, which held a Civic Fortnight at the British Empire Exhibition to boost itself to the world. The Manchester Evening Chronicle declares that the "shocking unemployment in Lancashire is attributable not only to general bad trade, but partly to the lack of enterprise shown by leaders who prefer to muddle along in splendid, if wasteful, isolation instead of combining to achieve united prosperity."

The advertising convention has taught Manchester its lesson.

Some of the smaller towns whose authorities sought to entertain parties of American delegates got missed for the same reason—they didn't get into the movement early enough.

But these were only the negative lessons learned. There are many evidences of positive lessons.

This is plain from some of the thoughtful comments by writers reviewing the convention and its work. A leading article in the London Evening Standard showed how the new appreciation of advertising is materializing in its comments: "When the advertising conference takes 'Truth in Advertising' for its slogan, it is not only indicating an aim; it is also summarizing a situation."

S. Murray Allison, quoted above, also showed this in another place. He said: "The first thought that leaps to the mind is this: Barnumism is dead. It has been dying for years. It has been reserved for Wembley to administer the coup de grace. . . . The first result of the convention is that Barnumism has been killed for good and all."

It is evident, too, that the convention has thrust home upon the slower-grasping British minds many facts that were either only dimly seen or not realized at all. Points made during the proceedings by various speakers have made definite impressions.

THIS WAS A. A. C. W.'s MOST PROSPEROUS YEAR

WHEN the new Executive Committee of the A. A. C. W. elected at the recent convention in London, convenes in New York in September, Lou E. Holland, Kansas City, re-elected president of the organization, will report that the Association, during the last fiscal year, enjoyed the greatest prosperity and growth in its history.

Comparisons based upon the annual audit of the Association's affairs show the following conditions for the fiscal years ending with the annual convention in Atlantic City in 1923 and the convention in London in 1924:

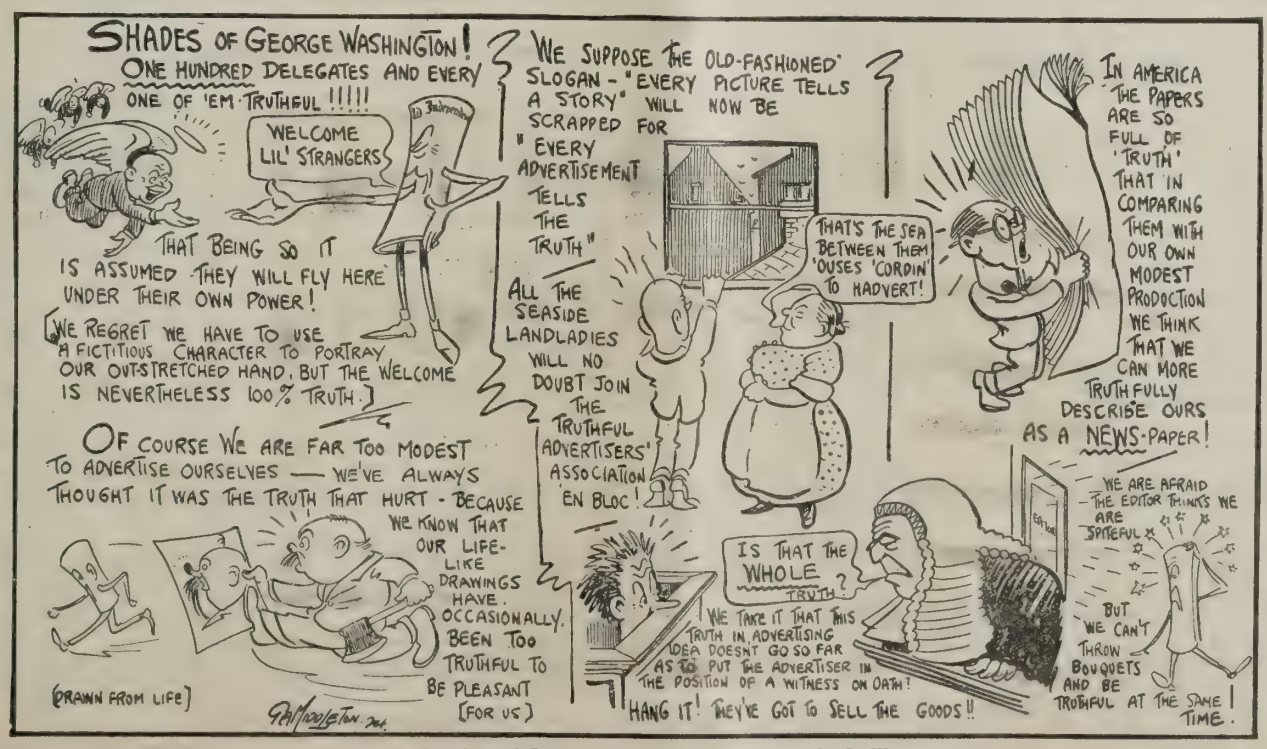
Cash	$37,427	$9,730
Accounts Receivable	$56,082	$33,458
Total Assets.....	$143,941	$85,144
Surplus	$83,261	$41,742
Total Members...	30,144	28,038
Affiliated Clubs..	313	267
Affiliated Departments ...	25	22

One that is being widely quoted has a special interest for Americans. It was the references by W. J. Boardman, of New York, in his paper on the "Markets of the U. S. A." (in the advertising agents' departmental) to the preference among Americans for well-known brands, and their ability and willingness to buy British goods if the goods were right and put forward in the right way.

Side by side with that is quoted another statement by C. F. Tomkinson, advertising manager of the Harrods store, in addressing the retail advertising session. Referring to the exploitation of the British market by American manufacturers he insisted upon "the unconscious British dislike of novelty" and said that this characteristic had a direct and powerful influence on the methods and presentation of advertising. That, he believed, was in contrast to the attitude of the Americans, for whom the fascination of a novelty was well-night irresistible. Experience, moreover, had shown British advertisers that it was unwise to introduce that note of familiarity, that heart-to-heart aspect, which was said to be acceptable to the American, but which our people instinctively resented.



Those two fundamental truths—the one concerning the American market and the other relating to the British market—have found wide quotation here, together with similar comments upon the specific characteristics of the two peoples.

Another point of view which the convention has served to illuminate is stressed by the Dean of Windsor, who attended several of the convention business and social functions. He was struck by the type of man represented in the American delegation and, in the London Times, claims "that the time has come when for the welfare of society we ought to study and understand the part this [advertising] profession is beginning to take in public life, and we ought to recognize it as an honorable profession, in which the ablest and best of our young men, who have suitable gifts, may find a noble career." If we do this, he adds, the new force may be harnessed to noble ends and may resist all the forces which are inevitably at work to drag it down.

It will be clear from these considered opinions and deliberate quotations that Great Britain has gained substantially in its general appreciation of the true principles of advertising.

Perhaps the most cogent summary of the convention is that of J. St. Loe Strachey, editor of the Spectator, who declares that as a result of the Wembley meetings, "advertising can no longer be treated as the chatter of the cheap jack, or the babble of the salesman. It is a world-force. . . . The first great quality of advertisement is that it is dynamic. It is a form of movement, or at any rate is designed to put us in motion and to keep us moving. Why is such movement beneficial? Because movements, i. e., activity, is as necessary to the health of the body politic as to that of the body natural. . . . There are entirely new worlds for advertisement to conquer. Some day it may be the essential instrument of rule, the method of reward, and the method of punishment. Advertisement has been a helot; is now a prosperous bourgeois. Some day it may be king."

That is the uplift to advertising in Great Britain administered by the great 1924 advertising convention; finer tribute to its success there could not be. And of those who, in the early days of the convention movement in Great Britain, came to scoff, all but a nameless and unimportant few have remained to praise. For the 1924 convention of the A. A. C. W., held in London, will in the near years prove its true internationalism far above personal or parochial interests.

WORLD'S BEST PRINTING AT MILWAUKEE SHOW

Graphic Arts Exposition Has Wider Scope Than Ever—All Printers Asked to Meet in Chicago

MILWAUKEE, Aug. 20.—Brilliant, representative and larger than anything of the kind ever before attempted, the Graphic Arts Exposition given in Milwaukee by the International Association of Printing House Craftsmen during their annual convention attracted more than 12,000 visitors who were delighted with the exhibits showing the remarkable advance that has been made in the "art preservative of all arts." Many nations contributed to the display, which included steel, copper and zinc etchings, multi-colored copper and wood prints. From a new process developed in Europe were shown reproductions of the old masters executed from hand-colored copper plates, including the choicest work of Rembrandt, Titian, Rubens and other painters, reproduced with such skill that they looked like originals.

K. Schmidt-Wolfrathshausen, of the art staff of Simplicissimus, German comic publication, contributed a collection of linoleum prints that attracted widespread attention. The Bischoff Company exhibited drypoint etchings of beauty made possible through a recent German invention.

The American Institute of Graphic Arts displayed 50 books, selected as the outstanding works of the year, in a competition based on excellence of type from an artistic and technical standpaint, binding, illustrations and general execution.

Harry Hillman, of the Inland Printer, lent 23 original drawings of early master printers. Aldus Manutius, who invented Italian type in the 15th century, was represented. One of the star attractions was a Ramage printing press used by Benjamin Franklin, loaned by the Norwood Press.

The latest and best devices for printing, especially color work, were examined with interest by the throng of visitors.

Dr. F. G. Yanes, First Secretary of the Venezuelan Legation, and Carlos Mantillo, of Quito, Ecuador, told members of the Association that South Americans are more difficult to please with printing than the people of the north, attributing this to the fact that the Latin-Americans have a better taste in art. Drawings must be perfect and the tints in color work must be true representations of the original, they said.

"One for all and all for one." This should be the motto of the printing trades, declared George K. Horn, president of the United Typothetæ of America, in an address. "The good of the trade is the common object of all printers' organizations and they ought to combine to work for it," he said. "All printers' organizations will be invited to a conference in Chicago next October. It will be held at the same time that the annual convention of the Typothetæ takes place. We want repreesntatives of craftsmen's clubs, electrotypers, machine makers and all other departments of the industry to get together and form a central organization for the advancement of printing. The Typothetæ will lead the way."

Cancels Resignation As Editor Seattle Union-Record When Voted Funds

E. B. Ault has reconsidered his resignation as editor, Seattle (Wash.) Union Record, tendered several weeks ago, and is now acting as editor-in-chief.

Mr. Ault resigned on account of the failure of the Seattle Labor Council to appropriate sufficient funds to carry on the work of the Record properly. Following his resignation, the Council set aside the required amount of money and requested Mr. Ault to resume his former position.

THE COPY BOY

I do not know just where we got the kid
But there he is! . . . Just fill your eye with him!
Fatty of head as skinny he of limb,
No talents underneath his brush are hid!
It must have been Pandora tipped the lid
And let him out for us; or it might be
We plucked him luckless from some Christmas Tree—
But anyhow, he came to us, he did.

Our Copy Boy! . . . He fills the room for us
With freckles, and a sort of languorous air
That seems to trail his Presence everywhere!
We yell for him . . . we wait a while, then cuss
And wait again; our story runs a muss
And we go temperamental, and we say
Things that are rude, until he takes away
The output of some other Gloomy Gus.

Some stars fortuitous guard that youngster's course;
Some special gods protect him as he gropes
Jarring the timing of our horoscopes
And plunging us in moments of remorse!
Yet he may be a Captain of the Bourse,
Develop into some gigantic pace
Belying all the freckles on his face,
This Boy at whom we yell till we are hoarse!

I do not know just where we got the elf,
But there he is! . . . And there that kid will cling
While we yell "Copy!" till the welkins ring
And each man totes his copy for himself.

SET SPEECHES TABOO AT WASHINGTON MEET

Informal Round Table Discussions Occupy Entire Program at Seattle This Week—Entertainment Features Eliminated

Informal round-table discussions are entirely supplanting the usual program of set speeches at the semi-annual meeting of the Washington Press Association, Davenport Hotel, Spokane, Wash., which began Friday, this week, and will terminate Saturday night. The Washington publishers' request that everyone attending the meeting be allowed to ask questions and take part in the discussions was heeded by the executive committee in arranging the program. But one speech—and that following the closed banquet—is scheduled.

All entertainment which might interfere with work has been eliminated, owing to the limited time at the disposal of the newspaper men. Luncheons and dinners will be short and there will be no theater parties nor automobile junkets.

Topics on which round-table discussions are being held and discussion leaders follow:

PALMER QUITS POST-DISPATCH

Plans Uncertain, He Will Remain in Houston for Present

G. J. Palmer has resigned as vice president and director of the Houston Printing Company, publisher of the Post Dispatch, it was announced following a meeting of the directors last week. R. L. Mr. Palmer's plans are uncertain, he tells EDITOR & PUBLISHER. He will continue his work as special commissioner of the Texas Newspaper Publishers Association, which he took up 5 years ago, leaving the Post to do so and remaining out of active newspaper work until Jan. 1, 1924, when he resumed his connection with the Post.

He is one of the veterans of the Post organization, with more than 30 years service. For a quarter century he served with Col. R. M. Johnston and H. F. MacGregor as trustees of the J. L. Watson estate, conducting the Post during the minority of Roy G. Watson, principal owner of the Post until its recent sale and merger with the Dispatch. During that time Mr. Palmer was in active charge of its business management.

NEWSPAPER MAKERS AT WORK

Thrives on Responsibility—S. E. THOMASON

THE man who is the business manager of the "World's Greatest Newspaper" must, of logical necessity, be the "World's Greatest Business Manager." To hear his fellow-workers speak of him, one can easily believe that of Emory Thomason, business manager of the Chicago Tribune.

"He's a hard worker always," they say. "He has a continual smile and always carries on calmly, no matter what happens. He is extremely considerate of everybody in the organization—kind, democratic, pleasant, but firm. Undoubtedly his greatest ability, however, is to 'size up' a condition quickly and to make a decision instantly."

"Ever since Mr. Thomason assumed his present duties," declares one of his associates, "he has exhibited genius in gaining the co-operation of everybody about him. Every member of the Tribune organization knows that the heads of Colonel McCormick and Captain Patterson are chock full of ideas. They pass these along every day to Mr. Thomason, and he executes them. No added responsibility seems to burden him. When Liberty, the new weekly magazine of the Tribune and the New York Daily News, was launched, the business executive responsibility fell upon the shoulders of Mr. Thomason quite as a matter of course.

Mr. Thomason became business manager of the Tribune in 1918. Previous to his appointment he was a member of the law firm which represented the Tribune.

Successful in no small degree as a member of the bar, Mr. Thomason says that he had no thought of leaving the profession until William H. Field, then business manager of the Tribune, visited him one day in 1918 during the absence of Col. McCormick and Capt. Patterson in the army. Mr. Field made known his intention to retire from the position, and asked Mr. Thomason how he would like to succeed to it. Within a week the change had been effected, and Mr. Thomason found himself sitting behind a strange desk in a strange office with a strange title under his name on the door.

Despite the abruptness of the transition, a change that necessitated gaining quickly a thorough familiarity with a new set of imperative problems, Mr. Thomason progressed in his new task without apparent difficulty.

And then, strangely, one of the first things Mr. Thomason did, according to his own statement in an address sometime ago to students of the Medill school of journalism of Northwestern University, was to carry out a Tribune policy, which, had it been in effect previously, would have prevented him from making the change he did from lawyer to business manager.

"In talking with other publishers," he said, "I have told them that the Tribune always makes promotions from within the organization to fill executive vacancies."

"'But frequently you could find a better man somewhere else,' they say."

"True enough," Mr. Thomason replied. "In many cases it is possible to go outside of the organization and find a better man. But this policy would not give the Tribune the best newspaper organization in the world."

If the employes of the Tribune were to elect a business manager by Australian ballot, it is quite certain that the election of Emory Thomason would be unanimous.

Mr. Thomason was born in Chicago 41 years ago. He was graduated from the University of Michigan in 1904, and from the law school of Northwestern University in 1906. He is one of the active Michigan alumni in Chicago, continuing his interest in the affairs of his Alma Mater from undergraduate days.

Mr. Thomason is keenly interested in sports, not merely as a spectator but as a participant. Each noon he plays "deck tennis" on the roof of the Tribune building. He is an agile handball player and he likes golf. In the recent field day of the Tribune advertising staff Mr. Thomason caught for one of the baseball teams, while E. W. Parsons, advertising manager, pitched, and Colonel McCormick played in the outfield.

Mr. Thomason's greatest delight and pleasure is, however, horseback riding with his daughter, Elizabeth, his only child. The Tribune business manager has a beautiful home in Beverly Hills, a Chicago suburb.

Mr. Thomason also finds time to occupy the position of president of the American Newspaper Publisher's Association.

Cincinnati merchants do a big volume of business outside the "city circulation" limits of the Cincinnati newspapers. Some of it comes from the rich agricultural and industrial towns of Southern Ohio and Indiana whose natural trading center is Cincinnati. Some comes from the mines and lumber regions of Kentucky, West Virginia and Tennessee. But when you speak of your Cincinnati sales you are thinking of the volume that comes out of the metropolitan district of the city itself. So long as your sales are good there you need not worry about the outlying territory.

How to reach this key market, either to secure new distribution or to stimulate turnover for established dealers? That is the question. The answer is furnished by the successful Cincinnati merchants themselves: Advertise in the daily newspaper that has the most complete coverage of this market and the greatest influence on its buying habits.

There are 141,000 families in the city circulation area of the Cincinnati newspapers. Of these 19,740 families are foreign born and 10,575 negroes. Net 110,685 native white families. According to A. B. C. figures the daily city circulation of the Times-Star is 112,062 copies. That's pretty complete coverage, and that's what you are getting when you buy space in the Times-Star. The 39,685 out-of-town circulation is velvet.

For sixteen consecutive years local and national advertisers have placed more display lineage in the Times-Star than in any other paper in this territory. Last year this excess amounted to 4,481,358 lines over the evening paper having the second largest Cincinnati circulation and 2,192,708 lines more than the largest morning paper, including its Sunday magazine sections.

If you are primarily concerned about increasing your Cincinnati sales it may be well to begin with a study of the market in which your Cincinnati distributors must look for the bulk of their business.

The Graham Brothers Assault Mr. Bennett

During the election campaign of 1850, local issues were uppermost, and the Herald vigorously attacked John Graham, the Tammany candidate for District Attorney. Though a member of Tammany Hall himself, Mr. Bennett never hesitated to denounce its corrupt practices or the nomination of unfit men for office, and the defeat of Mr. Graham was generally attributed to the Herald's opposition. Graham and his brothers evidently thought so, and proceeded to revenge themselves, by assaulting the famous editor. His signed statement as to the attack follows:

"TO THE PUBLIC OF NEW YORK.—Little did the undersigned imagine, when he opposed the recent nomination of John Graham as District Attorney, made at Tammany Hall, and, also, when he opposed his election before the people of this city, on the ground of his utter unfitness both in temper and capacity for the office—little did the undersigned suppose that what he said would so soon be justified and verified by events and acts of a character equally in keeping with the candidate, his capacity and his subsequent defeat.

"On Saturday morning about ten o'clock, the 9th inst., as I was walking down Broadway in company with my wife, on reaching the corner of White street I was assailed by a gang of rowdies and ruffians, headed by the same John Graham, and his brother, DeWitt Graham, and also Charles K. Graham, another brother, with a ferocity and a violence that seemed to justify the belief that murder or manslaughter had been premeditated. Two police officers of the Sixth Ward—whose names I do not know—witnessed the assault, but made no effort to preserve the peace of the city from such a gang of ruffians.

"The avowed object of this gross violation of the law was stated by DeWitt Graham on the spot to be the opposition by the Herald to the nomination and election of John Graham as District Attorney. I replied to him on the spot: 'I have done nothing but my duty in opposing John Graham's election. Neither you, nor all the ruffians you can assemble shall intimidate me from pursuing a course which I believe to be right! In opposing John Graham I was right, and so the people of New York have decided.'

"The assault and the assailants will soon occupy the attention of the criminal authorities. * * *

"All the assassins and ruffians that may skulk from the Battery to Kingsbridge shall never intimidate me from the daily performance of those duties, or the vindication of every legal right that belongs to me.

"JAMES GORDON BENNETT.

"November 11, 1850."

The Tribune's version of the assault was as follows:

"On Saturday morning, about 9 o'clock, James Gordon Bennett and John Graham, late opposition candidate for District Attorney, met in Broadway near the corner of White street. Bennett was accompanied by his wife, who, however, had stepped into a shoe store on the opposite side of the street, just previous to the encounter. Mr. Graham was accompanied by his brothers, Charles and DeWitt Graham. He struck at Bennett with his fist as he approached, but the latter partially dodged the blow, which took effect on his hat and knocked it out of all shape. The second took effect just below Bennett's ear and prostrated him on the pavement. Graham then seized him with one hand, and with the other belabored him vigorously with a rawhide cowskin. Bennett suffered most in the face, his nose appearing very much swollen and bloody. Bennett made an attempt to defend himself with his cane, and cried out most lustily during his 'punishment.'

"A policeman attempted to seize Graham, but was prevented by one Mike Murray, known as a 'fighting man,' who gave the officer a violent blow. Graham later issued a card, in which he stated that every blow struck was by his own hand, and that he ceased 'as soon as Mrs. Bennett had reached the scene of action."

Mr. Bennett had John Graham and his brothers arrested for assault and battery. The defendants immediately began a policy of delay, getting the case postponed in the police court, until they could secure a writ of certiorari from Judge Daly, removing the preliminary hearing and investigation to the Court of Common Pleas. In the meanwhile, Mr. Bennett and his wife had gone to Havana, and John Graham then demanded that the case be dismissed, as the editor was not there to prosecute. Judge Daly refused this application, however, but held the defendants in very light bail, John for $500 and his brothers for $250 each.

As usual the majority of the Herald's contemporaries showed no sympathy for Mr. Bennett, declaring that his bitter attacks on Mr. Graham led naturally to reprisals, and the former in a pungent editorial published before he left New York, declared that he "expected all the obscure, old clo', or second hand journals of the city would seize upon this outrage as a windfall. The secret of their malignity, their paltry and miserable misrepresentations, their shocking bad state and bad temper is easily explained. From the old hack of a Jew, who would not hesitate to eat bacon if it would give James Gordon Bennett a pain in the stomach; through most of the Sunday and daily obscurities, it is the most fruitful motive that actuates them. With a few honorable exceptions, it is a low, grovelling feeling of envy at the success of a journal which, not being able to understand, they cannot tolerate."

DANVILLE (VA.) REGISTER'S NEW $200,000 HOME COMPLETED

WITH its issue of Sunday Aug. 10, the Danville (Va.) Register announced the formal opening of the Rorer A. James Building, a memorial to Rorer A. James, late owner of the Register and Bee, former State Senator and former president of the Virginia Press Association.

The new plant cost approximately $200,000 and has been in course of construction for 2 years. The structure, classic in design, is two stories high and finished in granite-hued terra-cotta.

Before his death Colonel Rorer A. James spent many months visiting the modern newspaper plants throughout the United States. The architects made every effort to meet the requirements of a newspaper office from which both morning and evening editions are daily issued.

The new plant has a frontage on South Union street of 52 feet and a depth of 110 feet down to Patton street. Although the building is but two stories, there are four distinct floor levels, the 3 lowest being devoted to the making of the newspaper, while the topmost floor includes 13 offices.

The business office, advertising and circulation departments are on the main floor. Across the lobby is the news department and editorial offices. The Associated Press occupies a balcony constructed above the telegraph editor's desk.

The composing room and stereotype foundry are located in the rear of the main floor, separated by clear glass partitions, elevated two feet above front level; the ad-alley immediately adjoins the advertising department of the office.

The press room is located in the basement on the street side. Storage for five cars of paper is provided in the basement.

In the rear of the sub-basement is a large room for use of the carriers and newsboys.

Rorer A. James, Jr., owner of the Register and Bee, was a partner with his father, Colonel Rorer A. James, and after Colonel James' death in 1921, became sole owner of the property, originally acquired by Colonel James in 1900. Colonel James at the the time of his death was a member of Congress from the Fifth Virginia District.

Rorer A. James, Jr. is 27 years old and is one of the youngest publishers in the country.

H. B. Trundle, business manager, has been with the papers for 24 years; Arthur H. Taylor, editorial writer, has been on the staff twenty years; Gerard Tetley, city editor, has held the position 15 years; Walter Christianson, telegraph editor, 8 years; Andrew A. Farley, circulation manager, 7 years; Laurence Furgurson, foreman of the composing room, has held his position 12 years, and Walter S. Covey, foreman of the press room, has been in the employ of the company for 28 years. The advertising manager, C. A. Eury, has been in charge of that department for 3 years.

The Amsterdam (N. Y.) Evening Recorder and Daily Democrat celebrated its 45th birthday Aug. 20. William J. Kline, now senior proprietor, has been at the head of the paper during its entire lifetime, while Gardiner Kline, junior member of the firm, has been with the paper 23 years.

What Happened---

---When the Press Herald increased its price to 3c?

The answer is Nothing—except that for the first two or three weeks the circulation sagged from 2% to 5%. But within a month and a half after the new price went into effect, the circulation was not only back, but gaining.

All this happened without premiums; without contests; without any special inducements and without any increase in our circulation force.

A quality product will attract quality people A 50% increase in circulation price is the strongest possible test of the Press Herald's popularity and a telling testimonial to its worth.

Mr. Edward W. Bok said over his own signature, "The Press Herald is Maine's Outstanding Newspaper."

Here are seven reasons for its greater growth

(1) Dominant Circulation
(2) Equitable Advertising Rates
(3) Reader Responsiveness
(4) Clean News and Advertising
(5) Conservative editorial Policy
(6) No Commission Direct
(7) "Maine's Outstanding Newspaper"

The record from 1914 through July, 1924, is taken from The Times' A. B. C. records. Our auditor's reports do not cover calendar years, tho each report for the fiscal year is divided into quarters making it possible to give verified figures for the daily average of each calendar year. An audit for year ending June 30, 1924, is expected soon. The figures published for the last half of 1923 and the first half of 1924 are taken from The Times' A. B. C. records.

You cannot get away from the circulation predominance of The Erie Daily Times in Erie, Pa. It is a circulation record to which we point with frank pride and to which advertisers look with absolute confidence.

THEODORE WRIGHT DIES ON COAST NEAR HIS 94TH BIRTHDAY

Editor of Philadelphia Record from 1877 to 1912 and President of the Company—Enjoyed Friendship of Presidents Cleveland and Wilson

THEODORE WRIGHT, president of the Record Publishing Company, and editor-in-chief of the Philadelphia Record, from 1877 until he retired in 1912, died Aug. 16 at his home in Hollywood, Cal., where he had lived since retirement. He would have been 94 years old Aug. 30.

Born at Columbia Flats, Bradford county, Pa., he showed mental precocity by having read the Bible from cover to cover when he was four years old His father having died, Theodore went to live with his mother's father, who had been editor of a Boston newspaper. He became a printer's apprentice at Lock Haven. When only 15 he was a journeyman printer. His general knowledge of history and politics then led him into reportorial and editorial work, first on the Williamsport Gazette.

It was while he was editor of the Harrisburg Patriot that his editorials attracted the attention of William M. Singerly, who had recently purchased the Philadelphia Record. Mr. Singerly brought him to Philadelphia to control the editorial policy of the paper.

In that capacity Mr. Wright, always a Democrat, wrote tariff editorials that were used as campaign material in the presidential contests of the eighties and nineties.

Mr. Wright was an early supporter of Woodrow Wilson and thus formed a friendship with him that continued until Mr. Wilson's death. The result of the election of 1912 was a source of great satisfaction to Mr. Wright, who had said he did not want to get out of harness until another Democratic President had been elected. He consented at the age of 82 to retire and spend the remainder of his days in California.

Tribute to Mr. Wright from one who knew him best appeared in the Duluth Herald editorial page Aug. 18 from the pen of M. F. Hanson, for 30 years associated with him on the Philadelphia Record:

"A GREAT EDITOR

"Theodore Wright, editor of the Philadelphia Record since 1877, passed away Saturday in Long Beach, Cal., closing thus, past 90 years of age, a long, a beautiful and a rarely useful life.

"Not all the great editors of this nation have been famous. Here is one who might have been, but by his own choice was not. He preferred to write anonymously; to submerge his own personality in the newspaper he directed and in the principles he advocated. Had he chosen to live in the public eye, as his great abilities and great force of character would have enabled him to do, he would have ranked with Dana, Bennett and Greeley, for he was a great editor in their time.

"But he chose otherwise. He preferred to live in the retirement of his extreme modesty, because his thought was upon the principles that moved his mind and the causes he supported, and never upon exploiting himself.

"He recognized to the full depth of a sensitive conscience the duties and responsibilities of the editor of a newspaper. He combined with the courage of a lion the heart of a woman. He never dodged an issue, he never failed to meet one squarely. Yet he always preferred a kind word to a word of criticism.

"Loved as few men are loved by all those who came into personal contact with him, he remained comparatively unknown to the wider public; yet he was the friend, confidant and adviser of several presidents, notably of President Cleveland and President Wilson, both of whom often leaned upon his sound, sure, shrewd and penetrating judgment.

"And now he sleeps, and yet he lives in the hearts of those who were proud to call him friend, and in the achievements of a long life devoted, with never a thought of self, to the public good."

Fargo Forum Installs Second Ludlow

"We pride ourselves on a very clean, neat looking paper each day" says Norman D. Black, Business Manager.

"WE purchased our first Ludlow in 1918, and immediately began the elimination of foundry type until at present all our foundry type is contained in one cabinet. We now pride ourselves on a very clean, neat looking paper each day.

"For five years we relied practically entirely on the one Ludlow, and kept it in constant operation every publication day, and never once were we held up by it. Last summer, due to increased volume of business, we added a second Ludlow to our equipment.

"With the consolidation of the Morning Tribune and the Forum we shall continue to use our Ludlows on both papers. To say the least, our experience with the Ludlow has been very satisfactory."

MAIL ORDER ADVERTISING

IN some localities there is a revival of mail-order advertising in newspapers. Particularly is it noticed in large-circulating Sunday newspapers, with heavy country editions. In recent months several large newspapers have campaigned for this business, with excellent returns. When it is made up with appropriate matter in "country sections," it is said to be particularly easy for newspapers to get, and when the medium is right, it pulls better for the advertiser than many other classes of business.

Publishers accept unusual responsibilities when they seek mail-order advertising. While there are numerous mail-order concerns which are as honorable in their dealings as other merchants, it is also true that the woods are full of impudent schemers who find it easier to prey upon the public through the mails than when they come face to face across the counter. Mail-order advertising must be closely inspected before publication, if the interests of readers are to be guarded by the newspaper publisher.

Nearly all of the advertising in the agricultural weeklies is typical mail-order display, with a liberal sprinkling of obvious frauds and such deceitful copy as the old "free" in 36-point bold caps, with qualifications in agate which wholly discount the glaring promise of something for nothing.

The publisher of the solid old farm paper of the East, the Rural New Yorker, takes his mission seriously. He not only carefully censors mail-order advertising before publishing, but regularly runs a column in his paper where readers may air their experiences with fraudulent or irresponsible advertisers. Indeed, the publisher goes further, and himself attempts to adjust cases of misrepresentation, or fraud, whether the imposition has been effected through his columns or otherwise. He invites his readers to complain to him when they have reason to believe that any advertiser or roaming schemer has imposed upon them.

The "Publisher's Desk" column in the Rural New Yorker, where advertising and buying experience is regularly recorded, is highly suggestive of the number of fakers who are at large preying upon the rural public through the mails. Despite the obvious care of the publisher to discriminate against fraudulent or misleading advertisements, a dozen or more readers are found bitterly complaining in every issue of the paper.

Fake securities, particularly in motion picture, oil and land schemes, are commonly reported. Another frequent complaint is that against the manufacturers of farm or home equipment, selling on a partial-payment plan, offering much but delivering little and tying up the purchaser with tricky contracts. One incubator manufacturer, for instance, in his advertisement said of his contract, "It means safe buying, with no chance of loss," and promised money back if the purchaser was not satisfied. However, when one of the machines failed to keep even temperature, spoiling three egg hatches, the manufacturer refused to refund the price of the machine and called attention to catch phrases in the contract plainly intended to deceive and defraud the buyer.

Mail order advertising is good business for newspapers when it is honest advertising; there is nothing worse when it is mere sticky paper on which to catch human flies.

If the newspaper men of the country should cut loose and publish in a single week, what they know— * * * * * !*

EGGS IN MANY BASKETS

THERE is "safety in numbers" in newspaper advertising. Better ten small accounts to fill a page of advertising than one account. Many a publisher has lived to regret having given the bulk of his effort toward satisfying a few big accounts, while neglecting many small ones. The value of the policy of having eggs in many baskets is obvious, yet EDITOR & PUBLISHER is constantly hearing of experiences in the field which justify unending reiteration of the advice: Cultivate and promote the accounts of small, reliable, ambitious business enterprises.

ECCLESIASTES
CHAPTER I. 9

The thing that hath been, it is that which shall be; and that which is done is that which shall be done; and there is no new thing under the sun.

FEATURE NEWSPAPERS

THE newspaper which attracts the eyes of the multitude by publishing many entertaining features as spice for a few facts worth reading and remembering, is worthy of respect and serves better, in instances, than sober papers which do not penetrate the consciousness of the rank and file of society. But a newspaper which lacks all purpose other than entertainment, with the most primitive appeals through text and pictures to the emotions of readers, is a burlesque show. We notice that the successful papers in this class, while seemingly frivolous in character, are very carefully edited by men who are expert in sugar-coating publicity pills. A man worldly wise and with fine discrimination is needed to edit a highly spiced, feature newspaper.

Who can measure the power for good or evil of the 35,000,000 copies of newspapers which are printed every day in our country? It is a sobering thought for those who write them.

BUSINESS AS USUAL

FOREIGN nations learn something of the spirit of the American press through the activities of American press associations conducting an international exchange of news reports. Recently one of the nations of South America indulged in a nasty little war, over tax disputes. Matters were being "adjusted" by rifle bullets. United Press Associations and Associated Press sell news to many newspapers in that country. The war censors did not approve of these American services receiving and disseminating reports about the nasty little war and caused the governmet to cut off incoming news services. United Press Associations and Associated Press could stand the pressure if the government concerned so willed and matters were permitted to take their course. Both services published such authentic news concerning the war as they could obtain for their clients. Evidently the government has now seen the error of its way for normal conditions have been restored.

MOST RESPONSIVE FIELD

THOSE newspapers that have put publicity behind their selling campaigns, advertising advertising intelligently and persistently, have had rewards equal to those of advertisers of good merchandise. The records show that great newspapers which were standing still while refusing to take their own medicine went ahead when they advertised their markets and the selling power of their papers.

"I have developed many advertising and publicity campaigns for newspapers in this country," writes a well-known advertising man to EDITOR & PUBLISHER, "and there is no such responsive field in the whole realm of business. A dollar spent to advertise a good newspaper in a good town buys more than almost any advertising dollar I know about. I have given nearly 20 years of my life to this special subject and looking backward I am struck by the fact that only a few men have had the vision to build their publishing businesses as the average manufacturers or retailer builds his, but those who have been able to see advertising for themselves have raised the towering structures of today's newspaper world."

One of the most devastating conventions in newspaper work is the notion that a subject is not news if it did not occur on the day of publication. Another is the reverse idea that any old event occurring today is worthy of print.

FUTURE PRESS ACTIVITIES

SIR ROBERT DONALD, well-known London editor, in a recent address envisaged the future newspaper as follows: It will be smaller, sometimes printed in colors. Photographs will be telegraphed. Pictures will more and more squeeze out the news. Before an earthquake in Japan or an eruption of Vesuvius has subsided, pictures of the event will be in print, in London and New York. The reporter will carry no notebook, but rather a microphone into which he will speak, conveying his intelligence to the newspaper office by radio.

He said that such methods would stimulate newspaper work because if people heard scraps of speeches over the radio and did not find them reported adequately in the printed pages, they would complain. He thought that newspapers might more and more have to go into the broadcasting business.

These prophesies do not seem to us as remarkable. Everything is being done here, at least experimentally.

The great problem that must be solved is how to make radio broadcasting by newspapers and such inventions as moving pictures by wire, profitable newspaper auxiliaries.

The grocer's sugar in the barrel, the butcher's leg of lamb on the hook, the dry goods merchant's cotton prints on the shelf, the advertising man's ideas in his head, are stocks in trade.

BARNYARD MUTUALITY

IN the pasture a sensible Jersey cow is quietly grazing. Three enterprising hens hover about her all day. It is fly-time and the average milch-cow's yield is greatly reduced, due to frenzied and constant hoof-stamping and tail-switching to free her body of the insect pests.

But this sensible bossy gives her mistress the usual brimming pail of creamy milk, thanks to a mutual-benefit arrangement with the three intelligent hens. Bossy permits them to pick the flies from her legs and belly, and when the insects are swarming on her neck and back, she will lie down and gently snooze while the feathered co-operators hop about at will over her broad frame, filling their crops with meaty delicacies. Through this enterprise the enemies of the cow become the easy prey of the chickens and the farmerette profits magnificently, both in milk and fat hens for the pot. Cracked corn is worth $3.25 the bag, but flies are heaven-sent.

Why can't men accept the advantages of co-operation, which benefits them and enriches the state?

News selection, to meet the varying tastes and mind habits of many people, while serving the best interests of the majority, requires the keenest minds in journalism.

WHAT'S WHAT IN THE FEATURE FIELD

WHEN Frank O. King, creator of "Walt and Skeezix" for the Chicago Tribune Newspapers Syndicate, was in high school at Tomah, Wis., he wrote an essay, entitled, "Newspaper Art." After that it could not be otherwise. King was destined to be a newspaper cartoonist.

F. O. KING.

"That essay," says King, "embraced everything I have learned since and much more."

Being graduated, there was nothing left to do but to put his essay theories into practice, and King started work for the Tomah Journal. He left there to become the "art department" of the Minneapolis Times, and such he was for 4 years, until he left to attend art school in Chicago.

In Chicago, King first worked for Hearst 3 years. Following that he went to the Chicago Tribune, where he has now been for 14 years.

In addition to Walt and Skeezix, King has created "Motorcycle Mike," "Bobby Makebelieve" and his "Rectangle" in the Chicago Tribune is credited with being originator of that familiar expression:

"It isn't the original cost, but the upkeep."

J. N. Pendlington, London Daily Mail correspondent in Japan, and also publisher of the Far East Magazine, which was forced to suspend following the earthquake of last September, is writing six Sunday articles on Japanese-American relations for the Readers' Syndicate, Inc. NOSE FOR NEWS NEEDED IN SOUTH AMERICA

Newspapers Still in Personal Stage with Comments, Rather Than News Predominating—Even Polititions Hate Publicity

A real "nose for news" is needed in South America, according to Carlos Viale, editor of the editorial page of the Buenos Aires Nacion, who this week told EDITOR & PUBLISHER of some of the difficulties encountered by newspaper men of Argentine.

CARLOS VIALE

"Journalism is still in the personal stage in Argentina," Viale explained. "It is now almost impossible to conduct a newspaper there in the New York spirit. It is an extremely difficult task to get news.

"Argentine people have a peculiar distaste for publicity. Society reporters are well received, and are even consulted about the 'best way of doing things' by the social elect; financial, political and sporting reporters are able to dig up some news, but in most cases people run the other way when they see a reporter coming.

"Even politicians pretend they hate to appear in print.

"It is most difficult to get pictures for our newspapers. We have no real news photographers.

"I can recall only one really interesting picture beat. Sr. Leopoldo Lugones, son of the famous Argentine writer, once succeeded in getting into the country estate of former President Irigoyen, a thing absolutely prohibited. Posing as a representative of a German cold storage plant which never existed, Lugones succeeded in taking photographs and gathering some very interesting data on the life at the estate. To fool detectives and uniformed police who watched the property, he had to resort to many clever ruses.

"Former President Irigoyen is a bitter enemy of publicity and is famous for having smashed several cameras before he became president."

Because of this general aversion to publicity, many Argentine newspapers are rather comment sheets than purveyors of news, Viale said.

"In this direction," he added, "we are in a period of evolution, which was begun with magnificent success by La Nacion under the direction of Jorge A. Mitre.

"Since the war, the progress of La Nacion has been stupendous and steady. It has increased its circulation without injuring it, so that it retains the great rich aristocratic public, within which it has an authority which it would be difficult to explain here in view of the difference in social customs."

Viale plans to spend about a month in New York before returning to South America. In addition to his position on La Nacion, he is also editor of the Argentine edition of Vogue.

JUDGE J. H. WESTOVER, editor and manager of the Yuma (Ariz.) Morning Sun, and president of the Sun Printing Company, has just been re-elected president of the Arizona Daily Newspaper Publishers' Association. This is his third year in office.

J. H. WESTOVER

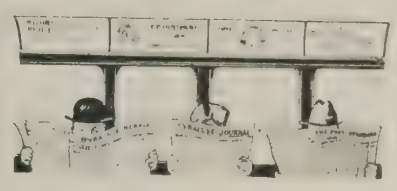
CLIMBING

AT 20 years of age, managing editor of the Iowa City (Ia.) Press-Citizen, is the record of Francis J. Starzl, who assumed the duties of his new position, August 4.

F. J. STARZL



Mr. Starzl is the youngest managing editor of any daily newspaper in Iowa, and probably the youngest to hold that position on any daily newspaper of similar size in the United States.

The Press-Citizen's new managing editor, however, comes from a newspaper family. He is the son of John Starzl, publisher of the Le Mars (Ia.) Globe-Post. He started in the newspaper business at Le Mars on his father's paper 8 years ago.

In 1921 and 1922 he attended the University of Notre Dame and did correspondence work while there for several newspapers of prominence. He worked on the Le Mars Globe-Post during the following summer, and in 1922 went to the University of Iowa at Iowa City where he was connected with the Daily Iowan.

The Newspapers of Syracuse

All Syracuse places confidence in the Herald, Journal and Post Standard. Some read one, others two and some all three, but collectively these three papers mould the public character and spirit that makes Syracuse a well known and well liked city.

That all three of these Syracuse papers chose the same source of type metal supply is not a coincidence. It's publisher's forethought.

When, like in Syracuse, every paper in a city lines up for the Imperial Plus Metal Plan, we can't help but feel a pardonable thrill of pride. That the Plan is serving a constantly growing list of papers having from 5,000 to 500,000 circulation adds responsibility to our pride.

Why Is This List Growing?

Why does one paper after another decide to use the Imperial Plan? Briefly because this dependable, economical and stable plan adds years of service to type metal. It answers a certain need. Write and let us give you the Plan in detail.

NEW YORK EVENING JOURNAL

ALL IN THE DAY'S WORK

Drawn Exclusively for Editor & Publisher

By JACK BECKWITH

He Prefers a Little Puddle

Joys of Being Versatile

JACK BECKWITH, for the past 22 years cartoonist and all-round artist for the Lynn (Mass.) Daily Evening Item, says that his greatest wish is that everyone liked his job as well as he does. "Jack" is known to practically every resident of Lynn, as he is one of the best 'mixers" possible, being equally at ease with Presidents and poodle-dogs.

Jack Beckwith

In the early days of his career he traveled around with the "big leaguers" and sent to his paper rattling good cartoons of the public idols at their practice. Jack is also a good photographer and is proud of the fact that the last known photograph taken of Homer Davenport was Jack's work and was taken at the home of the great artist. This picture was furnished to Boston papers upon Davenport's death.

Beckwith has been offered places with larger papers in metropolitan communities, but, like many New Englanders, is attached to his old home town, holding that friends are better than wealth and fame, and that he would rather be a big toad in a little puddle than the reverse. He has a charming wife and two interesting children, a son and a daughter, the latter of whom apparently has inherited a gift for the pencil.

Flynn Wins Golf Tournament

John M. Flynn of the Pittsfield (Mass.) Eagle, with a card of 90, won the annual golf tournament of the Eastern League Baseball Writers' Association held recently on the course of the Pittsfield Golf Club. A. W. Keane of the Springfield Union was one stroke behind Flynn.

WHAT THEY ARE SAYING

COOPERATION DOESN'T MEAN FAULT FINDING

"QUESTIONS arising between various departments of a business should be thought out, not fought out. Cooperation is not always fully understood or at least practiced to its fullest extent. Some still think it consists entirely of finding fault. The most successful executives of today are not drivers, but leaders. In a well-chosen organization where friendly feeling between heads and all members of departments is fostered, the employees, through various associations become friends, resulting in a humanized industry, which spells success for the industry."—H. R. Swartz, President, Intertype Corporation.

THE "INTERRUPTING IDEA"

"'INTERRUPTING idea,' as we define it, is something which goes into the advertising and stops the reader, commands his attention and compels him to buy. If it does those three things, it will do two more things—it will impress itself upon the reader's mind and stay there forever. Also, it will demonstrate itself in the act of selling, the thing all advertisers have been trying to get—advertising of the sort that does not depend on a salesman's co-operation or interest or feeling that he must advertise it like this, that or the other advertising man, but advertising that automatically becomes a part of his selling job."—Robert J. Tinsman, President, Federal Advertising Agency.

A PAPER AGE

"A FEW figures show that in the United States at least we are now in what may be truly called a paper age. On the 1920 basis, the per capita consumption of paper in Russia was 6 pounds and in Japan 12 pounds; in Scandinavia, a region of general education, it was 33 pounds and in Germany, the most thoroughly schooled nation in the world, it was 45 pounds, but this was by no means the limit. At the same time the per capita consumption of paper in Great Britain was 76 pounds, while in the United States it was 150 pounds or, in other words, more than 3 times the consumption in Germany and practically twice that in Great Britain. This is convincing evidence of the wide diversity of the use of paper in this country."—R. S. Kellogg, Secretary, News Print Service Bureau.

Church Copy At Your Own Price

Many newspapers have run without charge to churches or to local citizens copy urging church attendance. Some papers have felt they ought not to pay for such copy, and last year a friend of the Department advanced enough money to supply copy for a year to those papers which did not care to pay.

The Department has no source of income except the sale of this copy and in order to make it available to the smallest paper, the low price has been fixed of 3 cents per week per thousand circulation—and if this works out to a figure larger than the paper cares to pay, the publisher may fix his own price for the copy.

This Department desires to serve the churches and the newspapers.

N. Y. EVENING GRAPHIC DUE NEXT MONTH

Macfadden Evening Tabloid Scheduled to Appear Sept. 15, if Mechanical Equipment Ready

The New York Evening Graphic is the name selected for the new Bernarr Macfadden tabloid scheduled to appear in New York Sept. 15, EDITOR & PUBLISHER learned this week.

Workmen are now busy making ready the mechanical equipment for the first edition.

Date of this first issue depends upon when this work is completed, EDITOR & PUBLISHER was informed. The 4 octuple Hoe presses, part of the old New York Evening Mail plant, which Macfadden recently purchased from Frank Munsey, are rapidly being put in shape, however, and the new paper will probably keep to its opening schedule.

According to present plans, the new tabloid will run 32 pages daily. Pictures will be used plentifully and a weekly rotogravure section, appearing every Saturday, will probably be part of the regular schedule.

Macfadden had previously told EDITOR & PUBLISHER, that this venture marked an "entirely new and original phase in journalism."

His executives now reiterate this statement, but decline to make known the nature of the plans, other than saying that the Graphic will be alone in its field and will not be in competition with any other New York newspaper.

"It will contain the characteristics, which have made the Macfadden magazines so successful," are the words they use in describing it.

Martin H. Weyrauch, formerly of the Brooklyn Eagle, will be city editor; Joseph Appelgate, former feature editor of the Brooklyn Eagle will be in charge of features; William Herschey, formerly assistant sports editor, New York Evening Post, will be sporting editor; and Thornton Fisher will contribute a daily sport cartoon and article.

William E. Severn, formerly advertising manager of the Globe and more recently with the Herald, has been appointed advertising manager; O. O. Scattergood, who was circulation manager of the Globe and later with the Sun, circulation manager; John C. Spence, formerly with the Telegram and Evening Mail, press foreman; and Harry Martin, formerly with the Evening Post and more recently with the World, composing room foreman.

Annenberg Buys L. I. Estate

M. L. Annenberg, director of circulation for Hearst Publications, New York, has purchased the Great Neck, L. I., estate of George M. Cohan. The broker in the transaction reports the price at $350,000. It is one of the show places of the North Shore and has a frontage of 245 feet on Long Island Sound.

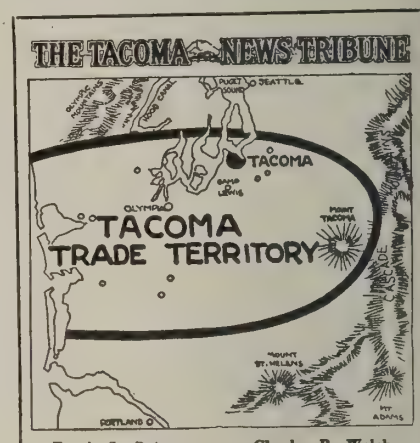
Plant of the Greenville (Miss.) Democrat-Times was destroyed in a fire that wrecked 3 buildings and caused a damage of $25,000.

PRESS ASSOCIATION FIELD MEN MEET

Ed Bemis, Secretary Colorado Group, Reelected President at Salt Lake City Gathering—Handling of Advertising Discussed

Ed A. Bemis, of Littleton, Col., secretary of the Colorado Press Association, was re-elected president of the State Press Association Field Men at their annual convention held in Salt Lake City, Aug. 11-14. Ole Buck, of Harvard, Neb., secretary of the Nebraska Press Association, was re-elected secretary-treasurer. Next year's meeting will be held in St. Louis, Oct. 9-14.

The convention was given over exclusively to swapping experiences and the discussion of problems that have been met or must be met in the future. One of the chief subjects was the matter of handling advertising in a wholesale way by press associations. It was agreed that while this may be a proper function for a press association, it should not be allowed to occupy any large portion of a field manager's time. It was agreed that advertising should be handled by a special department in charge of a competent sales manager and that the field manager's duties should be supervisory only.



In the matter of advertising agencies and special representatives, it was agreed that agencies are a necessity, at least under present conditions, and that field managers should co-operate with them in every way possible in the development of business. It was also agreed that the service of special representatives is important, the consensus of opinion being that any special representative who actually develops business for newspapers is worthy of his hire and that he should be helped in every possible way.

Manager Buck, of Nebraska, outlined a plan for auditing circulations that is meeting with favor in his state, although it has not yet been adopted by his state association. It was agreed that this is a valuable work to do and that the managers should co-operate with each other and with their membership to produce honest circulation statements.

Meetings were held in the offices of the Porte Publishing Company. The field men were guests of the publishing company while in Salt Lake City.

Doctor Sues Springfield Republican

Dr. James Patrick Coll, of Philadelphia, has started suit against the Springfield Republican Publishing Company of Springfield, Mass., for $50,000 in an action of tort, according to an attachment filed under the bulky personal property law by Deputy United States Marshal Joseph M. Winston. The attorney for the plaintiff, Arthur A. Tyler, of Springfield, declares the action taken is for alleged libels published in the Republican, July 18, 19, 21 and 27.

NEW YORK DAILIES PRINTED 9,919,374 LINES DURING JULY

NEW YORK newspapers in July, 1924, carried 9,919,374 agate lines of advertising—the smallest total for the month since 1918, and 831,644 lines below the figure for July, 1923, which had five Sundays, against four this year. Losses are noted for five papers in the New York Evening Post tabulation, which includes for the first time the figures for the Daily Mirror and the Evening Bulletin.

Four of the papers which show losses publish Sunday editions, and their decrease for the month was due to the missing Sunday, the daily editions running ahead of last July. Of the evening papers which publish no Sunday editions, only one shows a loss. The disparity in grand totals is also accounted for by the several combinations of newspapers during the past year.

U. S. BALKS ATTEMPTS TO "BOOTLEG" PAPER

Treasury Department Rules Railroad Manila Cannot Be Imported Duty Free in Guise of Newsprint—Collector Notified

Efforts to "bootleg" railroad manila paper into this country duty free under the guise of newsprint has been balked by the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, who recently instructed the New York Collector that this class of paper will be dutiable at the rate of 3 cents per pound and 15 per cent ad valorem after Sept. 4.

The instructions point out that railroad manila when imported in sheets 22 inches by 34 inches is ordinarily used as writing and typewriter second sheets, and is therefore dutiable.

As the matter now stands, paper to be admitted free of duty into the United States under the classification of standard news print:

Must be composed of groundwood and chemical pulp, with not more than 30 per cent sulphite content, and vary not more than 10 per cent from 32-pound basis weight with no regard to color.

Rolls must be 16 inches and over in width, and over 9 inches in diameter, and of a kind, quality and width ordinarily used by representative newspapers in printing their regular editions.

Paper in rolls and identical in composition with standard newsprint but which, because of its size, is chiefly used as wrapping paper, is subject to a duty of 30 per cent ad valorem.

Paper in sheets under 24 in. x 36 in. and identical in composition with standard newsprint was held May 6, 1924, to be dutiable as printing paper at ¼ cent per pound, and 10 per cent ad valorem under Paragraph 1301 of the Tariff Act.

"EMIR" ASKS $250,000

Sues News Syndicate Company, Inc., for Libel

"His Royal Highness the Emir of Kurdistan" filed suit for $250,000 damages in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia in Washington, Aug. 19, against the News Syndicate Company, Inc., and Max Lief, a reporter of the New York Daily News.

The plaintiff avers he is in fact the Emir of Kurdistan and that his name, fame and reputation have been damaged to the extent of the sum named.

Through his attorney, Abner Siegal, he denies allegations that he is an ex-convict, a famous swindler and hotel beat; that he is not the Emir of Kurdistan, and that he "crashed Uncle Sam's gates and buncoed bank presidents and society leaders." Inferences that he has been guilty of improper conduct are absolutely and wholly false, he declares.

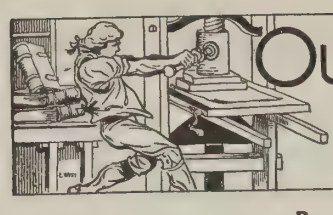
It was Max Lief, who working for the Daily News, exposed Prince Louis Henry de Bussigny de Bourbon as Harold Schwarm, New Britain, Conn., town dude, and Prince Zerdecheno Mohammed Saide as Jay A. Bonsou, Chicago salesman. Both bogus princes had been idols of New York society.

Your Indiana Market

is more than a state 276 miles long and 140 miles wide. It is a live, progressive and producing territory.

The Indiana people—nearly three million of them—have homes of the American kind and each home is a market for American goods and daily newspaper advertising will reach each family.

The 201,203 farms produced a crop value of $497,229,695. Corn leads in value of crops with $229,975,713; oats, $42,023,780; wheat, $98,101,056; hay and forage, $79,874,000 and vegetables $21,254,000.



This is only part of the money Indiana people have to spend. Indiana industries are large, the value of their products is nearly two billion dollars.

Get Indiana people interested in your product and one market problem will be solved.

Our Own World of Letters

By JAMES MELVIN LEE

A HANDY desk manual for advertisers has just been published by Ben C. Pittsford through Robert O. Ballou. The volume is a revision of Pittsford's Manual first published in 1921. Its purpose is to help the executive, the advertising man, and the buyer of space to produce better advertisements in a more effective manner.

No one will question the stress which the volume puts upon simplicity as the first rule of good typography. In addition it gives the following "daily dozen" for the copy writer:

1—Tell the truth—frankly and directly. Remember that advertising is simply "Truth well told."

2—Stick to simple words, short sentences, and brief paragraphs—"easy eyefuls of type."

3—Avoid words that are obsolete and ambiguous.

4—Don't be bombastic—make no exaggerated claims.

5—Don't try to be "clever." Cutting capers is a clown's job, not a copywriter's. Be sincere.

6—Don't argue or discuss. Tell your story briefly and to the point. Say as much as you can in as few words as possible. Keep your objective always clearly before you.

7—Be enthusiastic, but stick to the facts.

8—Humanize your copy. Give it a true-to-life touch. Give it movement and action.

9—Whenever possible, make your appeal to some fundamental instinct, motive or emotion, such as pride, pleasure, profit, self-preservation, comfort, affection, etc.

10—Be specific. Don't indulge in vague generalities.

11—Be conversational and friendly. Keep the other fellow in mind when preparing your message, or better yet, put yourself in his place.

12—Simplify as well as urge response. Make it easy for the reader to act on your suggestions. Don't leave him in doubt as to what he should do.

Especially helpful also are the practical suggestions on making a layout. The author will have the personal thanks of every printer if the following things are remembered in ordering typography:

Always wrap and protect cuts (especially half-tones) very carefully.

Give the typographer time in which to do a GOOD job and it will be a GOOD job.

State number of proofs (enamel or print stock) wanted when sending O. K.

To get your plates "the same day"—return your final O. K.'d proofs before noon of that day.

"Rush orders" are usually the greatest troublemakers and seldom give real satisfaction to anybody.

Don't give foundry orders to make plates before giving release and O. K. for plating. Also name of foundry you wish form to go, if you have a preference.

If you use a purchase order, be sure and send along with job—or give the number of the order. This will help prevent any misunderstanding.

Don't crowd too much copy into your advertisements or they will not be "easy eyefuls of type." One idea at a time in each advertisement is a good rule.

The chapter on type faces does not contain so much that is new, but it does present material in an easy way for reference. The same comment would hold true for what is said about rules and borders. Special sections answer annoying questions for those interested in direct advertising.

What makes the volume so valuable as a desk manual is the inclusion of related facts, such as paper stocks, information about copyrights, and the regulations of the postal department.

Y. P. WANG is distributing through the World Wide News Association, 303 Fifth avenue, New York City, "The Rise of the Native Press in China." This booklet is a thesis which its author submitted as one of the requirements for the degree of Master of Science in Journalism at the Pulitzer School of Journalism, but it contains much material of historical value—material that can be found nowhere else. To those interested in the historical development of the press the book will furnish information about a country which was the first to give the world the invention of paper and plates.

Advertisers seeking a market in China will find the booklet of considerable help in the selection of media to be used. Chapter IV, for example, is devoted exclusively to advertising and circulation. Evidently advertising is passing through the same stage in China that it passed in America. At present, patent medicine manufacturers are the heaviest users of space; next come the manufacturers of cigarettes. Strange to say, next to cigarette advertising comes book advertising—but only a little way ahead of theatrical advertising. But the Chinese theater, however, gets an exceptionally low rate.

As an illustration of the practical material found in the booklet I may quote the following:

The newspaper advertising in the native press is largely illustrated. In the newspapers may be found some of the crudest and some of the most carefully constructed advertisements. Redundancy is the characteristic defect of copy prepared by the native advertisers. Mistakes are very common in copy that is prepared by foreign advertising writers in foreign countries. To the Chinese copy of this kind is ineffective and even ridiculous. It is maintained that the copy can be illustrated most effectively by Chinese artists who are able to give local, or native, touches to illustrations.

The column line measurement of advertising space as practiced in America is impossible in Chinese newspapers, because of their variation in both length and depth, and the further fact that there is no uniformity in the line measurements of the various dailies. So Chinese space sells by the square inch, instead of by agate lines or column inches. The space may be of almost any size in keeping with the size of the newspaper page, which when measured as an American newspaper is approximately 15 by 20 inches, and when calculated by the sheet measurement of the Chinese is 31 or 32 inches by 20.

The booklet is a fine piece of research work—a fact which I hope will not be overlooked because of the attention I have directed to its practical value. The foreword is contributed by Professor John W. Cunliffe, Director of the Pulitzer School of Journalism.

L. L. STEVENSON, New York correspondent of the Detroit News, has just published through Brentano his first novel, "Big Game". While this novel is not a bit of fiction about newspaper life it will interest members of the working press, not only because its author is an old newspaper man, but because it is a bully good yarn about American business.

SIMPLY as an item of news I want to mention "Forty Years in Newspaperdom" by Milton A. McRae (Brentano). Briefly, this volume tells the story of the beginnings and expansion of the Scripps-McRae chain of newspapers. It also records the origin and growth of The United Press and the other news-gathering associations affiliated with the parent organization. The readers of this department will find considerable new copy about the old conflict between the United Press and the Associated Press.

THE one hundredth anniversary of the founding of the Springfield Republican will occur on Sept. 8. It is especially fitting, therefore, that an anniversary volume entitled "The History of an Independent Newspaper" will be published by the Macmillan Company at about that time. Its author is Richard Hooker, president of The Republican Publishing Company.

The Republican has had an interesting history ever since it first appeared on Sept. 8, 1824. Samuel Bowles and his immediate descendants made it one of the great papers of the country. Their influence was by no means limited to the paper they published, for on the Republican started many newspaper men who later achieved distinction in the metropolitan field. From its editorial rooms have come several distinguished editors of great magazines. Though I began my newspaper career on the Springfield Union I have always had the most profound respect for the Springfield Republican.

BUSINESS TICKLER

ARE you ready to go after the radio instrument and parts business that will come with the return of cool weather and D X reception?

Fall clothing and hats will soon be advertised heavily. Line up your share now.

Automobile makers look forward to their biggest closed car season. Get on the list.

Are the carpenters and glaziers planning to advertise for jobs of enclosing porches for winter sun-parlors?

It's not too late to get a few hundred lines from nurserymen with fall planting of bulbs and shrubs a few weeks distant.

"HOW Much Worthless Stock Do you Own? would make a good caption for an educational page run cooperatively by the bankers of your city. A good ad writer could work up a number of interesting pages along this line, keeping in mind that the principal point to feature is the fact that your banker should be consulted before buying such stocks. —George C. Marcley, Ogdensburg (N. Y.) Republican-Journal.

This is a good season to urge fall planting of tulips and other flowers for next spring. Many kinds of shrubs and trees must be planted in the fall of the year. It's also the open season for potted plants to be grown indoors during the winter. A little article on sun rooms and flower corners and a suggestion to the flower and seed men in your town ought to result in some advertising space for you.—R. John Gibler, St. Louis.

Now that there is a most unusual interest taken in the coming Presidential campaign on account of the distinctive personalities of the three candidates in the field, and the anticipation of considerable action, why not feature the campaign under an appropriate heading, and obtain cooperative ads, or a group, from the radio installers, retail radio shops and electrical accessory shops in your district, urging the public not to miss "listening in" to these addresses by purchasing receiving sets.—C. M. Litteljohn, Washington, D. C.

For its classified business column the San Salvador Diario Del makes a price for inserting the business card of its client, which includes a subscription to the paper, thereby linking circulation with advertising.—C. M. Litteljohn, Washington, D. C.

Snappy fall weather will soon be with us and along with it comes an unusually good appetite. The hotel, restaurant and lunch room proprietors ought to be good subjects for some additional advertising at this time. A suggestion about a "midmeal" coffee and sandwich urging people to drop in and have a light lunch during the morning and afternoon would bring customers into the restaurants. An "after the movie" suggestion would also give the eating places more business during their poor hours. Try these ideas on your local lunch room proprietors. It will mean some extra space!—R. John Gibler, St. Louis.

"Rep and Pep" is the heading of a cooperative page recently appearing in a northern New York newspaper. The space was equally divided, each containing a photograph of a local orchestra. Music dealers could also be included in such a page, especially if they sold the orchestras their instruments.—George C. Marcley, Ogdensburg (N. Y.) Republican-Journal.

Under a caption such as "Planning Your Autumn Wardrobe," there may be grouped from several columns to a page of hints to milady from the leading fashion shops of your city. Now is the time to secure such copy.—C. M. Litteljohn, Washington, D. C.

EDITORS ON AUTO TOUR

100 Wisconsin Press Members Leave Milwaukee for Annual Jaunt

About 100 members of the Wisconsin Press Association left this Saturday on the annual motor tour of the association.

After visiting the Graphic Arts Exposition and the Wisconsin Theater in Milwaukee the editors leave for East Troy, Elkhorn, Fort Atkinson, and Janesville. The itinerary for Sunday includes the great Yerkes telescope at Williams Bay, Lake Geneva, Brown's Lake and Burlington. On Monday the party will return to Milwaukee, attend the state fair and participate in a house warming of the Milwaukee Journal's new $2,000,000 home.

The association will publish a daily paper at the fair grounds in Milwaukee, Aug. 25 to 30. A complete printing plant has been set up and copies of the 360 newspapers of Wisconsin will be on file. This is the first time a newspaper exhibit of this character has been made at the fair. Each day the state fair daily will be in charge of a new set of editors.

Mr. Fuller's Transfer

TO EDITOR & PUBLISHER:—You were very unfortunate in the selection of your heading for the article relating to the facts concerning Hector Fuller and his connection with the National Cash Register Company. You stated, "Hector Fuller Quits Wm. H. Rankin Company."

As a matter of fact, Mr. Fuller did not quit the Rankin Company, but his transfer to the National Cash Register Company was arranged through Mr. E. D. Gibbs, the Advertising Director. Mr. Gibbs, after making a thorough investigation of all men available for the position of Publicity Director of the National Cash Register Company, came into my office and told me that the man he would really like to have, and the man who could fill the position best was Mr. Hector Fuller. He very frankly and very fairly said to me, however, that he would not offer Mr. Fuller the position without my approval and sanction. My friendship for Mr. Fuller was such that I realized the opportunity offered him, and authorized Mr. Gibbs to make Mr. Fuller the offer which he accepted.

It was done in a very friendly way, and there is nothing but the best of feeling between Mr. Fuller and the writer. Mr. Fuller has certainly made a place for himself as an advertising writer, and a writer of news publicity, and I am sure his experience with the National Cash Register Company will be as successful as it was with us.

I would greatly appreciate it if you would make this correction because I do not want—and I am sure neither does Mr. Fuller—anyone to labor under a misunderstanding.

WM. H. RANKIN,
President Wm. H. Rankin Company.

Miners Advertise in Daily

The Iowa local of the United Mine Workers of America has started an advertising campaign to promote the sale of coal, having placed a full page advertisement in the rotogravure section of the Des Moines (Ia.) Sunday Register, Aug. 17. H. T. Watts, business manager of the newspaper, points out that to his knowledge this is the first time any miners' union has promoted and paid for an advertising campaign.

PLAN TWO NEW HOMES IN CLEVELAND

Work on Times Building Scheduled to Start This Week—News and Sunday Leader Site Chosen

Announcement was made Monday, Aug. 18, of plans for new buildings for two more Cleveland daily newspapers. The Times, at present published at 307 West Superior avenue, has let the contract for a new building at Payne avenue, N. E., and East 22nd street. Work on the building was to have been started this week.

The News and Sunday Leader announced it would construct a new building at Superior avenue, N. E., and East 21st street, two blocks from the site of the new Times building.

The Times building will be two stories, with foundations designed for 6 stories, the other four to be added later. It will be of re-inforced concrete, with terra cotta exterior, 90 by 104 feet, providing 25,000 square feet of space for the newspaper plant. It is expected to be ready for occupancy the first of next year. The land and building cost $250,000.

The business offices, circulation and advertising departments will occupy the ground floor. On the second floor will be the news room and composing room, with private offices for officials of the company. The press room, lockers and shower baths will be in the basement.

Frank M. Ball was the architect and the contract was awarded to the Crowell & Little Construction Company, the same concern that has the contract for the new plant of the Detroit Free Press.

SMALLPOX MENACES DAILY

Waukegan Sun Employe Contracts Disease But Paper Not Quarantined

Not even smallpox succeeded in preventing regular publication of the Waukegan (Ill.) Daily Sun, which erroneously was reported closed down this week as a result of an employe being stricken with the disease. Earl Corser, a printer, became ill and two days later it was diagnosed as smallpox. The case was reported to the Illinois Department of Public Health and Dr. S. S. Winner, a representative of that department, started an investigation.

As Corser was out two days before he actually contracted the disease, Dr. Winner declared the danger of exposure to others was very slight as compared with what would have been the case had he remained at work longer. Dr. Winner therefore did not insist upon closing the plant, but advised all employes to be vaccinated. This plan was followed.

OHIO "RE-DISCOVERED"

Two Cleveland Plain Dealer Men Take Trip Around State's Rim

Travelling in a flivver, Fred Charles, reporter, and Burton Emerson Williams, photographer of the Cleveland Plain Dealer, have just completed what they called a "rediscovery trip" around the rim of Ohio.

The aim of the expedition was to keep as near as roads permitted to the boundaries of the state. Stories written in a light vein were sent back to be published with pictures in the newspaper. The trip was considered a splendid opportunity to get names of people from many sections of the state into the newspaper, as well as to establish contacts at a great many out-of-the-way places.

Merchant Scores Newspaper Rates

Newspapers are making too strenuous efforts to obtain increased circulation and the advertiser pays in higher rates was the complaint made Aug. 15, by William J. Hayes of Minneapolis before the 12th annual convention of the National Association of Retail Secretaries in Des Moines, Ia. Dicussing newspaper advertising and rates, Mr. Hayes declared a "bad situation" has developed. He suggested that newspapers handle their business with the same efficiency as applied by retail merchants, and urged the retail merchants and newspaper advertising managers to "get together and through co-operation solve this problem."

Brisbane Adds to Realty

Arthur Brisbane, who has been constantly acquiring real estate properties in the Fifty-seventh street section, New York, added to his holdings this week by leasing the 5-story dwelling, covering a lot 20 by 100.5 at 113 East Fifty-seventh street. The lease is for a term of 21 years at $13,000 per annum. The tenant is to alter or erect a new building to cost at least $50,000.

HUNCHES

One Dollar Will Be Paid for Each "Hunch" published.

ABOUT a year ago we began a series of weekly first page features which we called "Boyhood Days." A boyhood photograph of some prominent citizen, such as a well known merchant or holder of public office, was obtained as well as a recent photograph. Half-tones were made, and the first week the boyhood picture was printed with an invitation to our readers to guess the identity of the "boy." The next week the recent photograph was published alongside of the boyhood picture, and accompanying them an appropriate story, giving the names of those who had answered correctly. A good deal of interest, too, centered in publishing some of the incorrect answers, which generally proved very amusing to friends of all parties concerned. In addition to the splendid reader interest, there is the goodwill created with the merchant or prominent citizen by virtue of the publicity involved. Incidentally, the up-to-date half-tones are also valuable contributions to the morgue.—W. Webb McCall, Mt. Pleasant (Mich.) Times.

A local news reporter recently compiled a most interesting and profitable story by visiting all of the local dairies and making a tabulation of the recent improvements in the line of equipment and the best practices of handling milk from the standpoint of quality and sanitation. He also mentioned the different breeds of cattle and the physical condition they were in. The citizens are always vitally interested in the milk supply and the dairymen appreciate publicity along the lines of improvements that they have brought about.—P. L. Plyler, Danville (Va.) Register.

Before 350 orphan girls in Mooseheart, children's home maintained by the Loyal Order of Moose, were permitted to bob their hair "like other girls," Secretary of Labor James J. Davis, one of Mooseheart's "guiding hands," told them they would have to have the consent of their nearest relative—the parents, if living. They all ran for paper and pen. Are the orphans in institutions near you permitted to follow the bobbed hair craze, or do officials ban it on the grounds of impropriety or the high cost of "upkeep"? It's a new angle to the always interesting bobbed hair question that should make a good story.—Robert L. Beard, Fort Wayne News-Sentinel.

Hobos are always good for copy, provided one or two can be found who will talk. They have a sign language all their own. An "X" means a good place for a handout; an inverted dipper signifies a dry town and one standing up properly reveals that "hooch' is available. Five horizontal lines means that a woodpile is handy before a "handout" is given; 30 tells of a month in jail for vagrancy. These signs and a lot of others will prove to have a new meaning to newspaper readers if they are given a little publicity.—A. C. Regli, Eau Claire, Wis.

A contest that is causing hundreds of persons to "lie like everything" is the Denver Rocky Mountain News Liars' Contest, which several hundred persons entered during the first few days of its duration. Folks must lie for the sheer love of it, for the prize to the day's best lie is the nominal one of two theater tickets, yet the Munchausen masterpieces pour in! The Chief Liar of the News decides the winner on the triple grounds of originality, brevity and humor. The contributions make fascinating reading.—F. J. McEniry, Denver, Col.

Ask the ticket agent at the railroad station if the older married couples are taking their vacations separately nowadays. If they are, what's the reason? Is modern literature responsible? Do young couples likewise take their vacations separately? Perhaps golf and mah jong will explain the separation during vacation time. When is the peak of vacation? Is September becoming more of a vacation month?—Max Hahn, Toledo (O.) Blade.

With the war a full decade behind us, turn to what was happening ten years ago in your city having a bearing on the commencement of the conflict. A slant backwards this August is particularly timely, and should be interesting to your community.—C. M. Litteljohn, Washington, D. C.

Visit a book store and get a story on the mistakes people make when they ask for books, such as the woman who wanted that story about an asylum written by a crazy woman. It turned out to be "Told by an Idiot."—L. G. D., Davenport, Iowa.

"Tales the Cops Tell," a series of stories of old-time police adventures, makes an interesting feature. A Memphis daily is running this series written by a police lieutenant, but a police reporter can handle them just as well.—E. N. Reese, Cleveland, O.

What would the cost of lighting your city and your home have been a century ago if the same number of candle-hours of sperm oil and tallow candle lights had been used? Power companies can supply material for your city. One power company recently published figures showing the cost per 1,000 candle-hours a century ago at $2.40 for sperm oil and $5 for candles compared with 7 to 20 cents for electricity.—A. Nix.

To a great many persons the eternal shifting and traveling of railroad freight cars is a deep mystery since on the surface it would seem next to impossible to keep track of the thousands and thousands of carriers. How do the freight depots keep track of the vast array of rolling stock? What mass of records must be compiled for this information, and what does it tell when listed? Just how railroad officials know where every car of their line happens to be at any particular time is a basis for an interesting railroad story.—A. C. Regli, Eau Claire, Wis.

Build newspaper individuality with news!

CONSIDERABLE space has been given on this page to the sale of Chicago Tribune features. Their value as circulation builders, when so advertised that the public knows about them, is unquestioned.

But every intelligent and loyal reader of a newspaper wants an interesting, authentic presentation of the news. This primary function of a newspaper is occasionally forgotten in the quest for the sensational, the amusing, the unusual.

The Chicago Tribune carries, as part of its Syndicate organization, a leased wire news service. This service, we believe, helps a publisher to give his newspaper an individuality which newspapers carrying only the dispatches of the regular press associations do not have.

The service covers:

1. About 15,000 words nightly.
2. Politics: The developments at Washington and New York, with particular attention to the coming presidential campaign, covered without prejudice by men of unusual ability and reliability.
3. Foreign news: Staff correspondents in 14 news centers of Europe and Asia; men in Mexico and South America. American reporters who distinguish between news and foreign propaganda.
4. Domestic news: The best features from Chicago, New York and other American cities.
5. Signed leads to big articles carried by the press services.
6. Bulletins on all big events to allow early action on pictures and cuts.
7. Pacific Coast: A special correspondent covering this fruitful source of interesting stories.
8. The important events in sports.
9. Valuable and exclusive market news.

Carbon copies of leased wire reports, showing the quality and scope of this service, will be mailed, with rates, at your request.

A Sun Route Is A Business—

¶ But a Sunpaper carrier is a different kind of newsie.

¶ Sun Carrier Service is a man's job and the carriers responsible for its efficiency and growth are business men. The privilege of delivering the Sunpapers into the homes of Baltimore is a valuable franchise. Sunpaper "routes" therefore have a definite money value that the carrier "route owner" guards carefully.

¶ It is good business for the Sun carrier to see that he and his assistants give the kind of service that increases his customers. That's why Sun carrier delivery circulation continues to grow.

¶ This kind of home delivery service is also good business for Sunpaper advertisers.

Getting increased sales volume in Philadelphia

6583 diversified factories and 43,339 retail and 5007 wholesale business places create employment for the wage earners of the half-a-million families in the Philadelphia territory.

Depression, slumps and sales decreases rarely touch Philadelphia because of its varied industries. It is not dependent on any one line of manufacturing or product.

If your sales charts show declines in other sections turn your attention to Philadelphia, "the world's workshop," and concentrate your advertising there.

More than half the homes in Philadelphia are owned or being bought by their occupants. One savings bank alone has 268,000 depositors. Nearly 200,000 passenger autos are owned by its citizens.

Resor Announces A. A. A. A. Research Bureau As Progressive Advertising Step

Association President Outlines Plans for New Body to Save Publishers' Money, Solve Agency Problems, and Make Qualitative Circulation Analysis—To Start By October

By PHILIP SCHUYLER

WHAT its creators claim is a "new and progressive step" in American advertising is about to be taken.

This was made plain this week, when, in an interview with EDITOR & PUBLISHER, Stanley Resor, of the J. Walter Thompson Company, New York, and president of the American Association of Advertising Agencies, outlined plans for formation of what will be known as the "A. A. A. A. Research Department."

Mr. Resor, when interviewed, had just returned to New York from an extended trip to England and France, following the international A. A. C. W. convention, and was enthusiastic about results obtained from this meeting. Questioned, he also discussed the future of advertising in America and the present relations between advertising agencies and newspaper publishers.

Announcement of the proposed research department was first made several weeks ago exclusively in EDITOR & PUBLISHER.

Now plans have advanced to such a stage that more detailed description of the contemplated organization is available. In fact, before the October meeting of the A. A. A. A. in Chicago, the department will be functioning, Mr. Resor said. Its conduct will probably be one of the central discussions at the convention sessions, some of which will be held jointly with the Audit Bureau of Circulations.

Salient features of the new idea in advertising, as outlined by Mr. Resor, are:

1.—The Research Department will make a "qualitive" analysis of newspaper and magazine circulations in the United States.

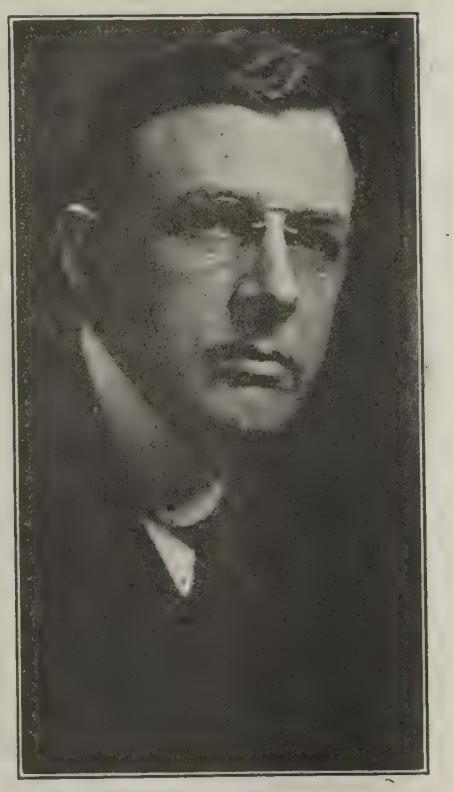
2.—It will in no sense be in competition with the Audit Bureau of Circulations, whose reports are primarily "quantitative" in regard to circulations.

3.—It will aim to be a saving to both advertising agencies and newspaper and magazine publishers in that duplication, now common because of the various existing information sources, will be avoided.

4.—Research work to be undertaken by the new department will seek to solve problems common to all advertising agencies. It will not be confined solely to analysis of circulations.

5.—Trade areas will be competently surveyed without bias.

6.—A high calibre research authority will be engaged by the A. A. A. A. to direct the department.



7.—Findings will not be restricted to members of the A. A. A. A. exclusively.

8.—Reports will be available at stated intervals for general inspection by agencies and client advertisers.

9.—Expense of maintaining the research department will be borne by the A. A. A. A.

Organization of the department was first broached and further discussed at A. A. A. A. executive committee meetings held in January and April and at a later session for the months of July and August.

Some time ago plans for interviewing men capable of handling the proposed organization were started. A list of 155 men, naturally prominent in work of this kind, was made up and is now being considered. Selections of the executive to fill the important post will be announced early next month, Mr. Resor said.

STANLEY RESOR Says

Successful advertising is built on fact rather than assumption.

All persons connected with the marketing of commodities are eager to know what bearing incomes have on circulations.

We are just beginning to realize the power of advertising.

There is a wider recognition today of the fact that advertising involves a thorough study of markets and problems, against the old conception that to say something clever was all that was necessary.

Relations between newspaper publishers and advertising agents are infinitely more intelligent today than ever before, infinitely more productive.

The writer was anxious to learn what effect the new department would have on established merchandising departments now being operated by many newspapers as aids to advertisers.

In answer to this question Mr. Resor said they were in hopes that in time this new work would help to greater effectiveness and substantial economy in this direction.

"It will save the publishers a great deal of annual expense and time in answering questions relative to their fields, as well as save the agencies by standardizing information and avoiding duplication," he said.

"We are not, however, going at this plan in an army system way. We mean to begin modestly and expand and develop later."

Report had it the idea for the new research department originated with President Resor of the A. A. A. A. Mr. Resor, however, was quick to deny this assumption.

"It was so speedily adopted without a dissenting vote by association members," he declared, "that I am convinced formation of such a department has long been in the minds of many advertising men.

"Quite in line with the evolution of the advertising profession, we are seeking to uncover additional facts to work from in the placing and making of advertising. Successful advertising is built on fact rather than assumption.

"This fact-finding principle, and the effort to avoid duplication constitute the main purposes of the proposed research department.

"The department, to my mind, signalizes a new and progressive step in the advance, which advertising has been making in the past decade. During this period, the tendency all along the line has been to work more and more from a fact basis. The 'Truth in Advertising' movement instances a phase of this evolutionary process.

"This advance is particularly discernable in the circulation and publishing field. Ten or 15 years ago, there were publications that would not make their circulation figures public.

"Then the Audit Bureau of Circulations was established. Circulations were audited and authoritatively verified and analyzed in so far as they were broken up into city, suburban and rural distribution.

"Now we propose to carry circulation analysis further.

"Our research into circulation figures will seek class rather than mass values. We will seek to discover the intellectual and financial differences between readers of the various media. All persons connected with the marketing of commodities are eager to know what bearing incomes have on circulations."

Turning from the subject of the new research department, Mr. Resor became most optimistic over the topic of the future of advertising in America.

"We are just beginning to realize the power of advertising," he said.

"Tremendous growth for the profession lies ahead. Ten years from now will show as great an improvement in advertising methods as that of the past 10 years.

"Relations between newspaper publishers and advertising agents are infinitely more intelligent and satisfactory today than ever before, infinitely more productive.

"This has proved an important impetus to advertising development."

Another impetus to advertising advancement, which Mr. Resor did not wish to overlook was that provided by the international A. A. C. W. convention in London last month.

"More than anything else, to my mind," he said, "this convention brought about wider recognition of the fact that advertising involves thorough study of markets and problems against the old conception that to say something clever about a product was all that was necessary."

James O'Shaughnessy, executive secretary of the A. A. A. A. who has been touring the Continent, following the A. A. C. W. convention, is due back in New York, Sept. 2. More detailed plans for the October meeting will then be made.

The new A. A. A. A. Research Department, is just one of the latest progressive advertising innovations for which this association has been responsible. In addition to Mr. Resor and Mr. O'Shaughnessy, officers and members of the executive committee, who directed its formation are:

Merle Sidener, of Sidener-Van Riper Advertising Company, Indianapolis, vice-president; S. A. Conover, of S. A. Conover Company, Boston, secretary; Roy S. Durstine, Barton Durstine & Osborn, Inc., New York; Jesse F. Matteson, Matteson-Fogarty-Jordan Company, Chicago; A. W. Erickson, the Erickson Company, Inc., New York; H. S. Gardner, Gardner-Glen Buck Company, St. Louis; John Benson, Benson, Gamble & Crowell, Chicago; C. D. Newell, Newell-Emmett Company, New York; David G. Evans, Evans & Barnhill, Inc., New York; Henry B. Humphrey, H. B. Humphrey Company, Boston; William L. Day, J. H. Cross Company, Philadelphia; Harry Dwight Smith, Fuller & Smith, Cleveland; and Morton Caldwell, the Chambers Agency, Inc., New Orleans.

BANKERS' $1,000,000 NEWSPAPER AD CAMPAIGN FIGURE FAR TOO HIGH

Editor & Publisher Research Shows 10,000-line campaign in 164 Dailies Would Cost But $227,000—Buying 11,115,000 Circulation

DECIDED leanings toward the magazines as the proper media for an institutional advertising campaign by the Investment Bankers' Association of America are evident in the report of the association's publicity committee, which will be acted upon at the association's convention in Cleveland, Sept. 22-24.

This association, whose members place in daily newspapers practically all of their publication advertising intended to sell their wares and services, are advised by their committee report, prepared by Robert Stevenson, Jr., of Chicago, that a newspaper campaign for the association is a million-dollar proposition and that an adequate campaign in magazines can be handled for a fifth or at most a quarter of that sum.

No plans have yet been made for carrying out the committee's plan, which may or may not be followed by the convention, it was stated this week at the office of Albert Frank & Co., New York advertising agency. John W. Prentiss, president of the association, declined to comment on its intentions, referring all inquiries to Harry Rascovar, president of the agency.

Any newspaper advertising man with a stub pencil and the back of an envelope could have proven to Mr. Stevenson and his committee associates that million-dollar campaigns in the newspapers are rare birds and that expenditure of any such sum by the association would cast serious doubt on theeir qualifications to handle investment funds. A million dollars would buy 10,000 agate lines in every one of the 2,100 odd daily newspapers printed in English in the United States with a handsome allowance foor production of the copy. Ten thousand lines may be called equal to four full pages, or sixteen quarter pages, or a 200-line advertisement once a week in every morning and every evening paper in the country. That is what a million dollars will buy in newspapers, if the advertiser has a bottomless purse and likes to see his name in print as often as possible.

But, no institutional campaign by investment bankers requires any such scope. Their membership is centered in 94 cities, with the bulk of it in the first ten according to population. Advertising directed at individuals beyond the territory these offices cover may produce scattering results, whose total will fall far short of balancing the advertising expenditure, it may be confidently stated. Advertising concentrated on prospects within the scope of members' offices touches the heart of the prospective market.

Daily newspapers alone can furnish that concentration. A morning and an evening paper in a U. S. city where the membership is represented—a total of 164 newspapers—would place the association's messagesage in the home of practically every investor or prospective investor in the territory, and the cost—well, the following ten inches of type tell the story more clearly and completely than any words can put it:

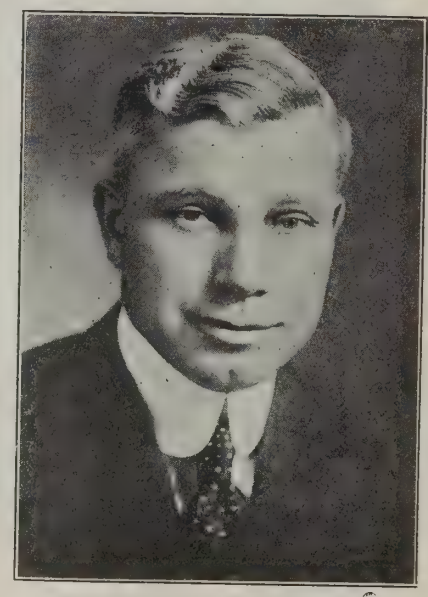
Totals	11,115,000	$227,740

There we have 11,115,000 circulation every day, which can be utilized in a 200-line advertisement appearing twice each week in each city at a cost of less than $230,000. The amount advocated by the committee as necessary for a "very effective" campaign in the magazines was $260,000.

This newspaper list con be curtailed appreciably, with a corresponding cut in cost without making it one whit less effective than the association's suggested series, which probably would comprise full pages once a month in the leading magazines.

The above newspaper list includes two papers in every city in which the association is represented, except where only one daily paper is published. Usually a morning and an evening paper were selected, but where no morning paper was published, two evening papers were used. Circulations, as the heading states, are approximate, exact figures being avoided because the writer does not presume to identify the newspapers concerned. Even allowing a generous amount for preparation of copy, the sum required for complete coverage of the association's territory through daily newspapers does not exceed the committee's estimate for "effective" work through the magazines. It is only one-fourth or less of the committee's estimate for a newspaper campaign, despite the confident assertion of the committee that "a million dollars a year is the usual and general answer to the question as to what such a campaign would cost."

Here is a chance for missionary work by newspaper men among the bankers in their home cities. The investment bankers as individuals have been convinced that the daily newspaper is best for their own advertising, but they still harbor the idea that the medium for a national institutional campaign is elsewhere. They constitute another group to be educated by the newspapers to the truth that "National Advertising is Newspaper Advertising."



THESE TIPS WORKED

Allen Gives Ideas on Running Small Town Daily

Ninety per cent local new, 10 per cent wire is the best basis to use in making a small town daily, is the opinion of Crombie Allen, editor and publisher of the Ontario (Cal.) Daily Report, who is visiting New York this week.

Allen, who is also president of the Southern California Associated Dailies, has made a great success of his property in Ontario, a city of only 12,000 population.

"The reason why a great many country town dailies fail," he said, "is because they are so often run by men who have worked on metropolitan newspapers. Nine out of 10 want to do too much for the small town, and the people can't pay the price.

CROMBIE ALLEN

"What is needed is to make a good local paper. And of the local news, stories of interest to the women are by far the most important, I believe.

"Although 60 per cent of small town-newspaper readers are women, news which would interest them is overlooked. Women reporters are a vital factor on the country press.

"Another thing, nagging editorials will always hurt a country paper.

"In advertising, I have found it best to sell on monthly rather than yearly contract basis. Now instead of trying to sell 6,000 inches a year at a special price, I sell 500 inches a month. Collecting the money is easier."

Mr. Allen has a staff of 25 men and women. He says they are able to do the work of 40, and explains it by a profit sharing system he has established.

The Pacific Coast publisher has not arrived at any definite profit sharing plan, and EDITOR & PUBLISHER would appreciate it if a newspaper owner who worked out a system would forward it.

ARBITRATION PRINCIPLE STRESSED BY BERRY

President of Pressmen's Union Chief Speaker at 13th Biennial Meet at Pressmen's Home, Tenn., This Week—Recommends Schools

"We have said, and in my judgment properly so, that when an employer agrees to accept the principle of collective bargaining, to concilliate, and to arbitrate when conciliation fails, he has gone as far as any sensible person could expect him to go and he is entitled as a consequence to the continuity in operation and the unstinted co-operation of organized labor and the public."

This assurance to newspaper publishers was given by Major George L. Berry, president of the International Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union of North America in an address at the thirteenth biennial convention of the International Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union of North America held at Pressmen's Home, Tenn., this week.

"We hold to this principle, and the genuineness of our adherence is best testified to by the existence of an International Arbitration contract with the American Newspaper Publishers' Association and an International Arbitration Contract with the International Joint Conference Council—the first covering the newspaper field and the second the commercial field of the printing industry of America. We shall engage in no strikes or industrial discords so long as the principle of arbitration can possibly be applied and that depends, insofar as we are concerned, upon the sole inclination of the employing printers and newspaper publishers of America. Thus, in my judgment, peace is assured so far as our organization is concerned; and that this policy is reasonably repsonsive to the newspaper publishers and employing printers is best manifested in the fact that there does not exist an industrial discord or a stoppage of business in America as it effects the printing department with which this convention and this International Union has to do."

Branch technical schools in geographical centers of the continent were also recommended by Major Berry in his address. "We seek through such schools," he said, 'to make for prosperity and stability in the industry in order that all of the units engaged in industry may profit as a consequence."

"SURPRISING," SAYS MACFADDEN OF NEW DAILY

Physical Culturist Promises Startling, But Unrevealed, Innovations with Appearance of His N. Y. Evening Graphic, Sept. 15—Capitalized at $2,000,000

"SURPRISING!"

Such was the laconic answer of Bernarr Macfadden, when asked this week what would be the nature of his first daily newspaper venture, scheduled to appear in New York as the Evening Graphic, a picture tabloid, Sept. 15.

Expressing his journalistic views in answer to other questions propounded, this surprising publisher dealt out a deck of promises with aces enough in them to raise the eyebrows of the best poker-faces around the newspaper table.

His newspaper is to run 3 editions of 32 tabloid pages daily with a Saturday rotogravure, at a possible 1 cent price, although this is not decided.

Crime news is taboo.

"Sensationalism" will be used, but at the same time his newspapers will be representative of "clean and constructive journalism."

Information without entertainment he considers "not fit to print."

These are four Macfadden aces. Other good cards are being withheld until the Graphic is out on New York streets and the readers can see them for themselves.

To begin with, Mr. Macfadden declared his belief that the majority of newspapers were not "unlike a factory brand of shoes; all alike, made in the same mold, controlled by the same old-time worn-out prejudices."

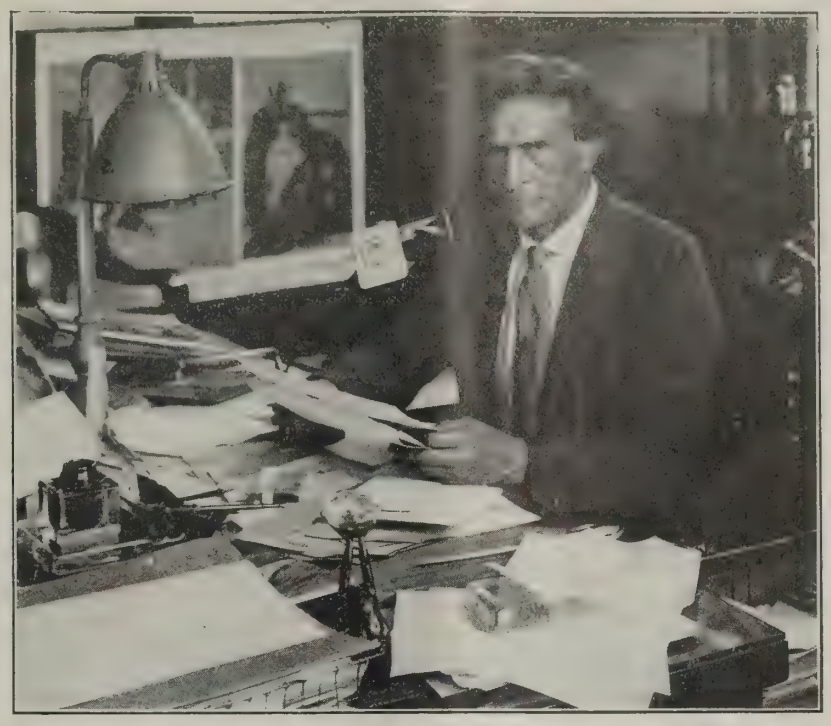
"Occasionally," he continued, "a man of force and originality has the courage to follow the bent of his inclinations. If he has business ability and mental balance in addition to a creative mind, he usually makes a big success. But newspaper publishers of this kind are rare.

"If a publisher has a stock of new ideas, he is usually impractical or short of capital, or both; or, if he has the capital he is afraid to take a chance.

"Therefore, many of our newspapers are so dull, dead and monotonous that they smell of the literary machine-shop, or the cemetery."

To correct this alleged odoriferous condition, Macfadden declared he will adopt "clean and constructive journalism," which, at the same time, will have a punch.

"Constructive journalism," he said, "has a building, developing influence upon its readers, and an influence of this sort is always clean. You cannot add to the character and ability of an individual through any constructive means without clean methods.



"I regard crime as a disease. You never hear of a healthy criminal—healthy in both mind and body. I don't believe in inoculation, and much of the so-called crime news only inoculates the public with the virus of crime.

"Sensationalism will be used where it serves a good purpose, but we will not confine our idea of news to murder, suicides, or divorce scandals. The name of an individual rarely appears in the newspaper unless he has evil tendencies. He must become a burglar, a bigamist, or an all-around crook.

"Extraordinary achievements in the lives of people should be just as interesting to the public as the details of crime and indiscretions.

"It is the editors who decide what should be called news. It is the editors who decide as to what will arouse the interest of the general public. But they are often greatly mistaken in their viewpoint.

"We do not expect to seek our circulation upon any particular level. In general we expect to sell to the masses and not to the classes. We do not expect to interest the 'high brows' unless sufficient intelligence is associated with this element to be interested in the great problems that affect all the people. We expect to sell to thinking people—to those who are desirous of improving their condition in life. We do not expect our paper to be cast in the waste-basket as soon as it is read, We hope that much of the material contained therein will be saved—pasted on the wall—framed—and be made an inspiration and a guide in the lives of our readers.

Promises Something New—BERNARR MACFADDEN

"The publishing business is largely identical in its various phases. You have to know how to cater to the public to whom you appeal. You have to know what they want to read, and you have to dramatize the news and the features that you present in such a manner that it will not only interest your readers, but will have an uplifting influence, mentally, morally and spiritually.

"I am egotistical enough to believe that I can direct the making of a newspaper that will teem with life as it is being lived. I believe that such a paper can be made to appeal to the masses in their own language; that it can be made so human and real that it will penetrate the hearts and souls of the readers."

Macfadden told EDITOR & PUBLISHER he would not support any political party as a party with his new newspaper.

"My editorial policy will be independent, the same as it has been in the page editorials I write in each of my 10 magazines every month," he said. "They express more liberal social ideas than they do conservative."

Macfadden concluded the interview by indicating he contemplated a national distribution and would use his magazine distribution organization to accomplish this end.

And so, hiding his biggest tricks, behind the ejaculation of "surprising!" Macfadden shuffles his cards preparing for the hardest game of his life—preparing, it must be said, full of optimism and faith.

He wants $2,000,000 in his purse to meet the ante. He has announced he will subscribe half this sum himself. The rest he desires to raise among those "willing to back" this enterprise.

To this end a corporation has been formed under New York laws with 200,000 Class A shares of the par value of $10 each and 50,000 Class B shares without par value. Only 10 per cent cash is required from the purchasers.

The prospectus continues:

"All dividends are payable equally, share for share, to the holders of the Class A and Class B shares. In the event of dissolution, holders of the Class A shares are first entitled to a return of the par value of their shares, and the remaining assets of the corporation are then to be divided equally, share for share, among the shareholders of both classes. Voting and subscription rights are, except as otherwise required by law, vested in the holders of the Class B shares.

"I have agreed to purchase, for cash, all of the authorized shares and, with my associates, including Macfadden Publications, Inc., will pay in to the corporation $500,000 for the 50,000 Class A shares to be retained by us; 35,000 Class B shares will be held by me and by those interested or associated with me in the management of the corporation, since it is essential, as all my friends will understand, that I retain control.

"The remaining 150,000 Class A shares and 15,000 Class B shares are offered for sale: Class A shares may be purchased at par in lots of one or more full shares, and each purchaser of ten or more Class A shares will be entitled to receive, without additional payment, one Class B share for each full ten Class A shares so purchased."

So great has been the response to this stock offer, according to claim, that this week a letter went out under the Macfadden signature to stock purchasers stating they need not take all the stock they had ordered because the issue was already over-subscribed.

Macfadden has notified shareholders he paid Frank Munsey more than $500,000 for the old New York Evening Mail plant, from which the Graphic will be published.

The question of a name for the Macfadden newspaper baby caused a slight preliminary flurry. First it was advertised as the New York Evening Truth. For awhile Macfadden's Graphic was contemplated. Now the masthead is set to appear as "The New York Evening Graphic—A Macfadden Publication."

It was argued that the physical culturist "Macfaddenizes" all publications he touches. As an example the Metropolitan Magazine is pointed out.

Macfadden purchased this old newsstand favorite in January. This September issue is its last under the Metropolitan title. In October it will appear as Fiction Lovers' Magazine.

Why not, then, "Macfaddenize" the newspaper from the start? was one side of the argument.

At any rate, Macfadden will be the editor, the directing genius, behind the new daily. To assist he has Fulton Owsler, managing editor of all Macfadden publications; Emile Gauvreau, managing editor of the Graphic, and Arthur Leslie, a proven publicity expert, who will be liaison officer between the new newspaper, Macfadden Publications, Inc., and the public.

Frank H. Gordon Makes Offer for Bangor (Me.) Commercial

Bass, city editor, are other stockholders. The plant is said to be held at $200,000. The Commercial was established 1870, by Marcellus Emery who for many years published a weekly called the Democrat.

MODERN ART MOTIF DISTINGUISHES PARIS DAILY'S NEW HOME

Action, Motion, Speed Symbolized in Glass Windows of L'Intransigeant Plant—Bas-Reliefs Depict News Processes

By G. LANGELANN

(Paris Editor, EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

ACTION, motion, speed, the sine qua non of daily newspaper production everywhere, have been symbolized in the decorations of the new building of L'Intransigeant, the leading Paris evening paper. The new structure, which externally bears some resemblance to the New York Herald-Tribune's home plant in the Times Square district has incorporated in glass and stone works of art considerably more radical than even the striking embellishments of American plants, such as the Detroit News, Des Moines Register-Tribune, or Milwaukee Journal buildings which have been depicted in EDITOR & PUBLISHER.

The facade is bold and already carries with it the impression of labor and achievement. Its lines are simple but effective. A magnificient wrought-iron door, with a printing press worked in as a design, forms the principal entrance of the white stone frontage. The main supports of the building carry the eye up to two orignal bas-relief groups depicting news-gathering, with the reporter, dressed in an aviator's costume, the telephone operator and the stenographer; and news-printing, with linotype operator, proof-reader and machine minder (in American, pressman).

The interior of the building gives a first impression of straight lines and columns, and while there is no florid ornament, there is beauty in line, and an immediate sensation of utility and appropriateness.

The editorial room is the nerve center of the building. The news department is on the upper floors, and the news flows in by wire and down to the editorial room in the center of the building, whence copy is sent downwards to the basement.

The galleries are spacious, with no narrow doors where there ought to be wide ones. One is struck by the absence of people running about and into one another, as is so often the case with Continental newspaper offices. This absence of bustling messenger boys is due to an excellent system of copy distribution through a mile and half of compressed air tubes. All these tubes have a terminal in one small but light office in the center of the building. A carrier can be sent and returned in forty seconds from any one part of the building to any other.

The Intransigeant office can boast of stained glass windows which are probably without equal. These are of silvered glass with the designs run into the body of the glass. The leaden divisions and bright colors of old stained glass work have given place to pure black and white designs traversed by straight or curved iron bars forming part of the designs.

Every design in the main staircase represents some part of news gathering or newspaper producing. The artist, M. Navarre, has used the best in impressionism to give by sweeping curves and straight lines a sensation of pulsating life, a something of that tense thrust and forward strive of news-gathering and newspaper production.

The small iron door leading to the printing works shows three cogged wheels working together, with a suggestion of flame behind them. Higher up the staircase is an airplane speeding through the air, but not still, quiet air, for one can see the eddies and currents and feel the strife and endeavor. Another window shows a motor car dashing along, and here again is the same movement suggested by sweeping curves.

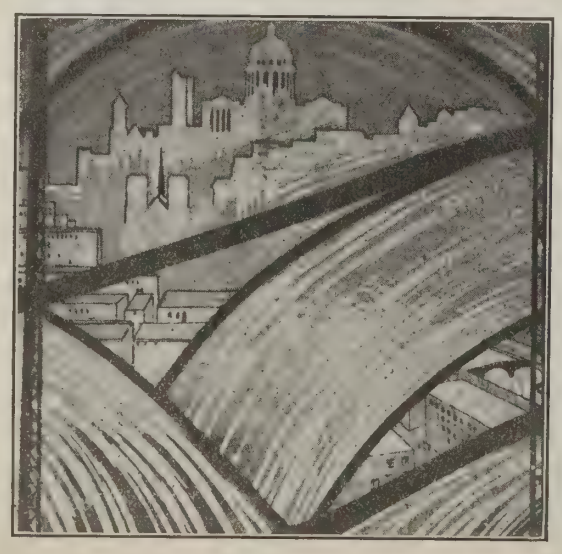
The printing works in the basement, below the street level, have two other floors below them, and an arrangement similar to that for feeding big shells into naval guns, runs up the rolls of paper and puts them in position for feeding into the presses. A large garage extends beneath the whole of the building, and here are kept the forty cars that distribute the Intransigeant all over Paris. Each truck in turn is run onto an elevator platform and sent up into the yard at the back of the building withing a few feet of an endless chain arrangement bringing the papers from the presses.

In the heart of busiest Paris, L'Intransigeant has located its new building, with six stories above the street level and three below. Near the upper left corner is shown a pediment which symbolizes news-gathering, the sculptor using the figures of the telephone operator, reporter and stenographer. The corresponding pediment shows in bas-relief the news-printing group—the compositor, proof-reader and pressman. At the lower left appears the main entrance, a larger view of which is printed below.

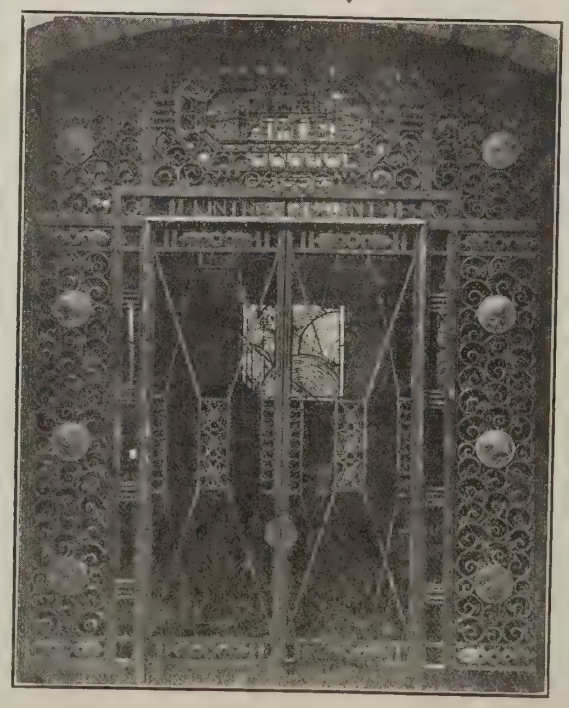
JOURNALISM A PROFESSION

So Secretary Davis Rules in Admitting Italian Over Quota Law

Newspaper work is a profession, Secretary of Labor Davis decided last week when he ordered the admittance into the United States of Alfonso Ressa, associate editor of an Italian weekly newspaper in Philadelphia, who had been barred by the quota laws.



Ressa came to the United States in February, 1923. The quota fixed for Italy under the immigration laws was exhausted. He was ordered deported but was finally admitted to attend the School of Journalism of Columbia University, New York. On June 30, the government served notice on him that he would be deported.



Counsel for Ressa opposed deportation on the ground journalism was a profession, making him exempt from quota provisions. This contention was opposed by immigration authorities and the case was carried to Secretary Davis who decided in Ressa's favor.

Canadian Daily Back to Tri-Weekly

The Oshawa (Ont.) Telegram, which changed from a tri-weekly to a daily paper nine months ago, returned to tri-weekly publication, Aug. 25 .

A printing press is worked into the wrought-iron design above the front entrance (central picture), and the medallions which flank the doors depict the agencies which give speed to news-gathering—the airplane, airship, dirigible balloon, mail steamship, railway locomotives, and racing automobiles. The panel which looms through the doorway is on the staircase and gives the impression of a maze of telegraph lines feeding into racing machinery wheels. At the right, a speeding motor car outdistances the birds in a stained-glass window on the main stairway. A particularly daring conception of the artist is found in one of the windows of the subscription hall, where amid his characteristic sweeping curves he has worked a view of Paris into his design.

HAMMOND PRAISES PRESS OPPORTUNITIES

Famous Dramatic Critic of New York Herald Tribune Says Men on Newspapers Today "Can Have Everything They Want"—Discusses Play Reviewing

By PHILIP SCHUYLER

CAN you beat it, Maurice Ketten? I've discovered the newspaper man who never has had the ambition to "write his way out" of the profession.

Honest.

Percy Hammond, who leads a topsy-turvy midnight life reviewing Broadway plays for the New York Herald Tribune and 75 out-of-town newspapers has always been, and still is, exclusively concerned with "writing his way in."

And very successful has he been, too. He is today undeniably one of the best of America's play reviewers. Mixing humor with sophisticated penetrating judgment, his stories of Broadway first nights, dashed off in 45 minutes to catch an edition, are little masterpieces of their kind. His daily column "Oddments and Remainders" is scintillating play-talk and opinion, good natured and witty. But the significant fact is, that above everything else Hammond is a newspaper man. Not forever looking outside the newspaper office for fame, he has found opportunities inside, has grasped them, made the very best of them, and always enjoyed his work.

"Perhaps this doesn't seem phenomenal to old veterans at the game (Hammond calls it game). Maybe it was merely the Hammond portliness that reminded me of Irvin S. Cobb who was always so everlastingly busy writing his way out, or the husky Heywood Broun, with his novel writing ambitions, or compact H. L. Mencken with his magazines.

"I think newspaper work is great. It has a terrible attraction," said Hammond to me this week, when I interviewed him at the Century Club, New York.

Because I thought I was talking to a humorist, I laughed. But my laughter proved a faux pas.

"No," the reviewer of Broadway failures and successes adjured me seriously, "I was born and brought up in newspaper work, and I wouldn't do anything else for———(His fee is far too extravagant).

"The tendency nowadays does seem to be an effort out and on instead of in and up in newspapering," he continued.

"Now so many fellows with inspiration become newspaper men to write short stories or the great American novel.

"And they seem so unhappy about it too.

"Yet newspaper work is drawing a far better class of men today than in the old days. It seems to me that nearly all the men around the Herald Tribune are wearing Phi Beta Kappa Keys.

"Well, the reason for this may be that unusual opportunities for success in satisfaction and in wealth are being offered news writers of today. If a boy on a newspaper is wide awake and thinks about it, he can get about anything he wants.

"Let him add some business instincts to his other qualities and he'll turn out a real financial success like Ring Lardner, Grantland Rice, Sid Smith, or Briggs."

The deflation of this big blue balloon came suddenly when Hammond admitted that his own son has become banker instead of newspaper man, and when he admitted that he himself had once written a play collaborating with Bert Leston Taylor of the Chicago Tribune. He inflated the balloon again with a puff, however.

"The play—it was rotten," he said.

Then he returned to the matter of opportunities on the present day press.

"Specialize on something" was his advice, "and at least once a month go down into the press room and watch the big presses running, printing your story of the day. There's sufficient inspiration for any newspaper man.

"Never forget the great experiences newspaper work offers. There's novelty in every department and many interesting contacts to be made."

Hammond has certainly lived his doctrine of specialization and experience.

"Always interested"—Fortunate PERCY HAMMOND.

Of his 28 years in active newspaper work he has spent 25 as dramatic critic. At the same time, he has found opportunity to cover World Series baseball games, big prize fights, national political conventions, and the biggest assignment of all—the Paris Peace Conference.

In the first place, as a clue to his fondness for the game, Hammond was born of newspaper people. His family still owns the Chillicothe (O.) News-Advertiser and the Newark (O.) Advocate. At 7, young Percy was setting type in the News-Adivertiser office. By 10, instead of planning to become a policeman or a locomotive engineer, he had definitely made up his mind that he wanted to be a dramatic critic.

Chicago was his first pot of gold. He went there while still young and became a reporter on the Post. By 2 years, of "thinking about it hard," as he explains it, Hammond was promoted to the position of free pass professor, which he has held ever since. He remained 10 years with the Post, then spent the next 13 years on the Chicago Tribune. During most of this time, Julian S. Mason, now managing editor of the New York Herald Tribune, was with him on both of these newspapers. Mason came to New York first. Hammond followed him 3 years ago.

Hammond has made his biggest success in New York. He has the ability of taking you by the arm in his play reviews, and telling you all about it. From reading his first night descriptions, which appear on an average of 4 nights a week, 11 months a year, one learns that he has definite ideas about dramatic criticism. These ideas were sought.

In the first place, he does not call his work dramatic criticism, preferring "play reviewing." Anatole France is his idea of a real dramatic critic.

"A lot of people think it is the province of a play reviewer to tell the actors and actresses how to perform. I don't agree," he explained. "I consider it is my work to appraise results, rather than suggest methods.

"It is foolish to take the theater seriously. Ninety per cent of it is pure bunk. There's no more art in the average Broadway play than in a circus. But of course certain types of plays should be considered seriously.

"When I started reviewing plays I was far too serious. Then I became cruel. After 2 or 3 lessons I stopped that.

"I remember a certain actress in a Jack Barrymore play that came to Chicago while I was on the Tribune. I panned her cruelly. After I had written the review, I went over to the Sherman Hotel. The girl came in. She was carrying a copy of the paper. First she ordered a big meal; then propped the paper against the sugar bowl, and commenced reading. When she reached the panning, tears came to her eyes. She got up and hurriedly left the hotel. That was sufficient lesson for me. After that I was often unkind, but never again cruel.

"After all, actresses and actors are as a rule very patient. It is remarkable what they stand.

"Because, it is true, a kindly reviewer is lost; a booster is absolutely no good; one has to be mean or one isn't read at all. And I have found that actors have much more admiration for a man who pans him than the man who pats him on the back too affectionately."

Hammond paid high tribute to John Anderson, young dramatic editor of the New York Evening Post, recently promoted to that position by Merritt Bond, managing editor.

"He has big opportunities ahead of him," he declared. "When I read his column this morning, I had to admit 'this chap is too good.'

"He has the necessary sophistication and can skillfully penetrate bunk. He is patient and amused at everything, and never angry. These are qualities of successful dramatic reviewers, to my mind."

Hammond is certain that interest in the stage is increasing tremendously in the United States. Last year, he recalled, more interest seemed to be evinced than he has ever before known in his 25 years' experience.

"I receive an incredible number of letters from people out-of-town, asking me about plays in New York. These letters average 15 or 20 daily. And I answer them all."

Add this letter writing to the business of attending first nights and only allowing about 45 minutes to write a review to catch an edition, and a play reviewer's life doesn't seem any too easy.

"But I don't get tired. I always manage to keep interested," Hammond will tell you—fortunate Percy Hammond.

DRAMATIC EDITORS TO JUDGE PRIZE PLAYS

John Golden, Producer, Seeks Aid of Newspaper Men in National Contest Running from Sept. 1 to Dec. 31

Newspaper dramatic critics located in more than 150 cities throughout the United States have been chosen to act as judges in a national prize play contest which will be inaugurated Sept. 1, by John Golden, New York producer of plays, it was announced this week.

The contest will be known as the John Golden National Prize Play Contest. The sum of $100,000 has been deposited in a New York bank to be used for productions, prizes, and the exploitation of the project.

Cash sums of $2,000, $1,000 and $500 as advances on royalties are to be paid to the first, second, and third prize winners and their plays are guaranteed production.

The dramatic critics, for the purpose of the contest, have been formed into an organization known as the "Coterie of American Play Critics." Any dramatic critic serving on an English language daily in the United States can become a member of the Coterie by applying to the office of John Golden, New York.

The contest is scheduled to end Dec. 31, 1924.

A plan has been arranged whereby certain members of the Coterie will receive as consideration for their services on each prize play a total of 25 per cent of the net profits.

Details of the contest were arranged by Mr. Golden with the assistance of Heywood Broun of the New York World, Percy Hammond, of the New York Herald Tribune, and Burns Mantle of the New York Daily News.

Having received the approval from these three New York critics, Mr. Golden broached his plan in letters sent out to 250 dramatic critics and dramatic editors throughout the country. Of the total 191 have agreed to become members of the Coterie.

YOUNG ON N. Y. TIMES

Author Succeeds John Corbin as Dramatic Critic

Stark Young, author, has resigned from the editorial staff of the New Republic to become dramatic critic of the New York Times. He succeeds John Corbin, who, remaining on the Times' staff, left last week for Geneva to cover the sessions of the League of Nations.

Graduated with a B. A. degree from the University of Mississippi in 1901, Young was awarded a M. A. degree from Columbia the following year. He returned to the University of Mississippi as instructor in English, remaining there from 1904 until 1910. From 1911 until 1915 he was professor of general literature at the University of Texas. During the following 6 years, he was English professor at Amherst College.

Young is the author of "The Blind Man at the Window" (verse); "The Twilight Saint"; "The Seven Kings and the Wind"; "The Queen of Sheba"; "The Three Fountains"; and several one act plays.

N. Y. PAPERS MUST PROOFREAD "BOGUS" BY NEW ARBITRATION RULING

Copy Over Local Dealer's Name Though Paid for by National Advertiser, Is Local, and Must Be Reset, George Gordon Battle Holds

SUCCESS cannot be said to have rewarded recent efforts of New York City publishers to lighten the burden imposed upon their organizations by the reproduction of local advertising supplied in mats or plates compelled by the laws of the typographical union. A local arbitration board, with George Gordon Battle, prominent lawyer, as chairman and arbitrator, last week held with the union on four of the six points submitted to him after fruitless discussions between the publishers and union representatives.

As most of the arbitrator's rulings were intended to interpret phrases of the local contract, these sections may best be quoted here, in the interests of clearness. They follow, with the disputed parts in italic type:

32. The practice of interchanging, exchanging, borrowing, lending or buying of matter previously used, either in form of type or matrices between newspapers or job offices not owned by the same individual, firm, or corporation and published in the same establishment, is unlawful, and shall not be allowed; provided that the reproduction of the original of such type, matrices, or plates, in type within four days of publication shall be deemed a compliance with this law.

33. All type matter in local advertisements, when matrices, cuts, type matter or plates are furnished the office, instead of copy, shall be reset as nearly like the original as possible within four working days of publication. A local advertisement is construed to be:

(a) The advertisement of any concern, firm, or corporation distinctively a New York concern, where such advertising is not identical with and a part of a general advertising campaign;

(b) The advertising of any New York retail concern, firm, or corporation (except a factory branch store) selling more than one sort of merchandise direct to the consumer. All advertising not answering this description shall be deemed out-of-town advertising and need not be reset.

(c) Type matter in local advertisements as determined above when reproduced by the photo-engravers' processes must be reset. Provided, it shall not be necessary to reset hand-lettered portions of such advertisements, or rotogravure advertisements.

(d) Financial offerings of securities advertising other than local issues shall not be reset.

Mr. Battle, avoiding all discussion of the economic waste of the "bogus" practice which has been proclaimed often by publishers and admitted by officers of the typographical union, adhered strictly to the matters before him for adjustment.

Point one, the definition of a "distinctively New York concern" found him in agreement with the union contention that "any corporation doing a large part of its business in New York and closely associated in the public mind with New York is distinctively a New York concern." He disagreed with the publishers' argument that such a concern must be incorporated in New York State and could not be one incorporated in another state, even if a New York office was maintained.

On the second point, he threw out the union's claim that advertising to be exempt from resetting must be identical in every respect, word for word, with advertising of the same concern printed elsewhere. He cited several specimen advertisements submitted as evidence in which the only difference was the address of the local distributor and held that such a difference could not make the copy local and subject to reproduction. On the other hand, he did not uphold the publishers' point that where the import of the copy is the same in two cases, the advertising shall be considered identical. His ruling is that "any two advertisements relating to the same subject matter, containing substantially the same language, and having substantially the same form and setup, may be considered identical."

His definition of a "general advertising campaign" is not wholly satisfactory to either party, even though it does inform publishers and advertisers that no campaign can be considered "general" which does not include a substantial number of newspapers.

He refused sanction to the union idea that a general advertising campaign must include at least twelve cities. He likewise relegated to subordinate place the publishers' claim that advertising in media other than newspapers should be considered evidence of the campaign's general scope.

"The chairman thinks," he stated "that there should be substantial amount of publication in daily newspapers outside of New York and he does not believe that any amount of publication in periodicals other than daily newspapers would be sufficient of itself to constitute a general advertising campaign. But if there is a substantial amount of publication outside of New York in daily newspapers, then the chairman thinks that the fact of additional publication in periodicals other than daily newspapers can be taken into consideration in determining whether or not there is a general advertising campaign."

In defining a "factory branch store," Mr. Battle found merit in the union claim that such a store, within the meaning of the clause, is a store owned and controlled by a factory outside of New York, whose main office is outside of New York. The publishers argued that the words covered the branch store of any factory whether located in or out of New York. Mr. Battle held that a branch store like that described by the publishers would be a local concern, if the main factory was in New York.

Mr. Battle, in a lawyer-like paragraph, disagreed also with the publishers' broad definition of "merchandise"—as "anything which is capable of being advertised for sale, anything for the possession or acquisition or enjoyment of which one man is willing to pay or customarily pays another."

"The term 'merchandise'," ruled the arbitrator, "as used in its ordinary significance, includes all those things which merchants usually sell, either wholesale or retail. These things so sold by merchants are the commodities in which merchants trade. They are the objects of commerce. They are the movables customarily bought and sold for profit, having ordinarily an intrinsic value in bulk, weight or measure. The term 'merchandise' does not, in the opinion of the chairman, include service as is rendered by telephone companies. It does not include bonds, nor would it include, as contended by the Publishers' Association, a cemetery lot. It includes, as the word signifies, articles which are usually traded in by merchants.

Mr. Battle's ruling on the only concrete dispute before him holds a several-sided interest for publishers. An advertisement of Brill Brothers, a large retail clothing firm, paid for by Kuppenheimer, a national advertiser, was submitted by the publishers as national advertising, exempt from resetting. The chairman disagreed, holding that the advertising was inserted for and by Brill Brothers and that it was their advertising and not Kuppenheimer's and that the situation was not changed by Kuppenheimer's payment for the space.

This ruling has a vital bearing on the practice of national advertisers, especially those in the clothing lines, of buying newspaper space at local rates through local distributors, thereby saving themselves the usual differential between national and local rates. It is possible that general application of Mr. Battle's ruling may result in new rate schedules covering such cases, adding the cost of composition to the existing charges, even though the copy reach the newspaper in mat or plate form.

Regret was general among the publishers that Mr. Battle had upheld the union contention that "bogus" advertisements must be proofread. The publishers frankly stated that the accuracy of the reset advertising did not concern them, as the matter was never seen by readers or advertisers after it was typed and its only destination was the "hell-box." Nevertheless, Mr. Battle's legal mind did not construe liberally the requirement that the advertising be "reset as nearly like the original as possible" and upheld the union claim that the section implied, though it did not state, the necessity of a proofreader to see that the original be followed.

The net of all which appears to be that the New York publishers have been confirmed in their right to spend every year an amount which would pay the salaries of several managing editors and business managers, for the purpose of solemnly composing and reading proof on "advertising" which fills no stores, sells no goods, brings in no revenue, and moves in a mimic, useless, profitless procession from linotype to melting pot and back again.

It will interest Mr. Holland's many freinds to learn that President Doumergue of France on Wednesday named Mr. Holland a Chevalier of the Legion of Honor, the decoration being conferred on the suggestion of Premier Herriot at the urgent request of the Committee of the French Press, headed by Senator Paul Dupuy of Le Petit Parisien, which organized the reception for the advertising delegates in Paris.

NEWSPAPER TYPOGRAPHY AND MAKE-UP

Publishers Should Take More Care with Typography and Make-Up of Their Own Advertisements—Many Examples of Cobbler's Kids Going Barefoot—Ideals for the Newspaper Typographer

By H. FRANK SMITH
Article XVII

NOTABLE among the many changes for the betterment of newspaper making during the past few years is the very marked improvement in the design and typography of the publisher's own advertising—whether this advertising appears in his own newspaper, or other mediums.

It used to be that publisher's announcements of the advantages of their newspapers were set up with little or no regard for appropriateness and harmony in the selection of type, borders, style of illustration, captions, margins, etc., not to mention the many other minor details that make for attractive typography and the effective presentation of a printed message.

In those days the "big idea" seemed to be to get the circulation figures in thick black type—and the wide solid mourning border was seldom left out. We are all familiar with the grotesque and ridiculous conceptions prevalent while this practice was in vogue—and even nowadays are occasionally shocked by reminders of the "dark age" of newspaper typography by the careless manner in which some busy newspaper executive permits his own advertising to "get by" without proper attention to typographic details.

Indeed, the examples of the cobbler's kids going barefoot are more numerous than they should be. If you do not believe this, just "take a look" at your own advertising in your own paper—and see for yourself. Whether your advertising appears in your own paper or some other medium, study it carefully—compare it with the typography of other advertisements—and see where you stand.

Newspapers co-operate very liberally with advertisers to attain high quality in general commercial advertising, and it is therefore reasonable to assume that the publisher's own advertising should have corresponding interest and attention. The fact that the newspaper's own advertising does not always average as high in typographic quality as that of other kinds of advertising and mediums cannot be charged to an effort to economize, because illustrations, specially-drawn decorative details and even color are used generously. There do not seem to be any conditions to excuse the lower typographic standards of the newspaper's own advertising; all the materials are there to work with; and all that seems neces-

Ideals for Newspaper Typographers

Comment and Criticism

A Review of Newspapers with the Idea of Making Friendly and Helpful Suggestions to Improve Typography and Make-Up

E. A. Blair, Times, Houlton, Me.—The Times has been commented upon so often that I should think you boys ought to be pretty near "fed up" on compliments. I cannot see anything that merits serious criticism, but there are many things about the typography and make-up that deserve much praise—not to mention the exceptional quality and abundance of the news. Your mast-head could be set more attractively, but all in all the Times is unquestionably one of the best-handled suburban weeklies in the world—and Houlton should be very proud of its newspaper, because it incorporates all the finest principles of country journalism.

Arthur C. Saunders, Daily Item, Portchester, N. Y.—The Item compares very favorably with the best dailies published in the smaller communities. Think a larger head would improve items run in panels on front page; your masthead could be refined typographically (looks like an ad, now); use something besides 6 pt. solid rule for borders; presswork needs attention (ink looks smudgy); classified page very good; use larger heads on editorials; make-up first page fine. You folks know what to do; just keep after the little things, improving here and there, and you will keep the pages of the Item pepped up.

Milton C. Jones, Saturday Review, Bergenfield, N. J.—I wish we had space enough to reproduce each one of the fourteen pages in a recent issue of this enterprising and aggressive weekly. It would be splitting hairs with a vengeance if we tried to make any suggestions to improve the typography and make-up of the Review. Every page, apparently, is a studied effort to attain the utmost attractiveness; and while there is a quiet dignity and simplicity about the paper—still every news item, editorial, feature, and ad stands out in an interesting and effective manner, and this is all accomplished without the use of any screaming type or funeral borders. As a splendid model of how a country weekly should be handled typographically, the Saturday Review cannot be improved upon. Bergenfield is indeed very fortunate to be represented by a paper so effectively conducted and attractively printed as its Review.

William P. Rose, Enterprise-News, Cambridge Springs, Pa.—Am sure if you opened your double-column subheads with a 2-point rule these heads would be more attractive; and if you set your editorials 2-point leaded they would read easier. Your ads would look better if some different types of border were used, instead of so much 6-pt. solid rule. With these little refinements a lively, newsy paper would be greatly refined.

Jesse E. Long, News, McKeesport, Pa.—Your editorial page is laid out very nicely, but would be improved if you replaced the gothic with some more attractive type face for headletter. Reset your masthead—it's battered and squee-gee looking. I believe your editorials would look better, if heads were set a size larger—and maybe in an italic, like Caslon Bold Italic or Bodoni Italic. The "Little Newslets" head is worn out—reset in new type and rules.

R. E. Lent, News, Passaic, N. J.—You fellows are making a pretty good job of your first and editorial pages—as you are with all the other pages. I would open the larger heads and sub-heads on front page with 2-point leads—they are too solid as now set. Subheads on inside pages should also be opened with 2-point leads. Ads and make-up on inside pages splendid; classified ought to "knock 'em over." Boys in composing room are making a fine job of it.

THREE SPLENDID EXAMPLES OF THE NEWSPAPERS' OWN ADVERTISING

Each advertisement incorporates careful organization, good illustrations and design, and thoughtful use of type. Direct, clean-cut and business-like, these advertisements are worthy of careful study.

FLO ZIEGFELD TELLS WHY HE BANNED BILLBOARDS FOR NEWSPAPER SPACE

Latter Far Superior in Attracting Attention of the Public, Says Famous "Follies" Producer—Signs Offend the Eye and Mar Natural Beauty

WILL the American theatre consign billboard advertising to the dump heap and hereafter rely exclusively on the newspapers?

Will advance agents of road shows leave more money with newspaper advertising managers and less signs cluttering landscapes surrounding cities of the country?

Florenz Ziegfeld Jr., world famous creator of the "Follies" this week answered "yes" to both of these questions, when they were asked him by EDITOR & PUBLISHER.

"FLO" ZIEGFELD, JR.

Ziegfeld, who has made a fortune "glorifying the American girl," thinks that by this time he knows what the public wants.

And, so he said to EDITOR & PUBLISHER, the public doesn't want unsightly billboards.

"I am convinced," Mr. Ziegfeld declared in an interview granted EDITOR & PUBLISHER "that newspaper advertising is far superior to any other form of attracting the attention of the public. And it can accomplish its purpose without defacing the landscape.

"Down with the billboards! I'll have no more of them."

To prove he meant his assertion, Mr. Ziegfeld stated that 64 billboard signs facing highways and railroads near New York and advertising the "Follies" and "Kid Boots" are now being destroyed. Contracts for similar forms of outdoor advertising have been cancelled, he said.

Simultaneously Ziegfeld has abandoned the electric light sign, one of the largest in New York, formerly maintained at an annual expense of $50,000.

Both this sum and that saved by the abolition of the painted signs which cost $75,000 annually will be devoted to increased advertising in newspapers, Ziegfeld said. Why?

"I don't think the theater can be satisfactorily advertised by means of the signboard" is the Ziegfeld answer. "At best a sign board can give little more than the name of the play, location and one or two brief facts.

"But such glittering generalities are not practical. No reader can gain an adequate idea of a play by speeding past a couple of painted lines at 20 miles an hour or more.

"Nor can the pedestrian pay careful attention to a sign at the side of him, when his eyes must lead him ahead.

"The sign board is good enough for frivolous phrases like, 'I'd Walk a Mile for a Camel'; 'Eventually, Why Not Now'?; 'Time to Retire' and similar slogans. But the dignity and worth of the theatre—an institution of art, cannot be maintained by such passing brevity. It must have calm and careful attention and time if its merits are to be properly considered.

"From another angle, it is important to remember that the theatre requires quick change of copy. Bookings, players, theatres and titles are forever being changed and modified. Often, the sign board statement is stale or incorrect by the time that the painters can get round to change them. The public wants what it wants when it wants it.

"Then, too, the sign board is very frequently not read. It is something of an intrusion on the attention. It is aggressive, obtrusive and out of harmony with the cultural principles for which the theatre stands.

"In contrast, the newspaper is authoritative. It can be read or tossed aside, according to the inclinations of the reader. It has definite departments assigned to the theatre. It is given over to responsible critics and editors. It is up to the minute in the latest authentic information that has to do with the theatre. Certainly such substantial values completely discount the value of chance bits of brief information, erratically distributed and ruining the view."

Other important business organizations are following the lead of Mr. Ziegfeld.

"The Continental Oil Company was the first Colorado corporation to show an active interest in the anti-billboard campaign," he pointed out.

"That company has decided to take down its billboards wherever they mar the beauty of the prospect—which means that before long, all its billboards will be down. In Kansas City, just by way of showing which way the straws are blowing, the people turned out not long ago, saturated a large number of unsightly billboards with kerosene and applied matches. That aided materially in beautifying the landscape.

"There is no doubt," continued Mr. Ziegfeld, "that the movement started by the National Committee for the Restriction of Outdoor Advertising is gaining impetus; a great many firms have already agreed to co-operate with the committee to preserve the landscapes of America.

"Naturally, the billboard interests and those who depend largely on them for income are a little concerned, though the general belief is that when the situation simmers down and the billboard interests confine their activities to commercial locations, the income from this source will more than offset the loss caused by the abolition of many of the signs along the highways.

"As recently stated: 'Outdoor advertising seizes the most salient portion of the landscape, the rock, the field, the tree, the hill, the mountain, the stream, the waterfall, the spot to which the eye would naturally turn, and there emblazons the advertisement of some pickle, potion or pill.'

"Though the language is somewhat virulent, I believe that Forbes Magazine is correct when it says that billboard advertisers 'are murderers; they kill views.' America leads the world in advertising. But the universally directed activities of certain advertisers, particularly large corporations, have threatened to bring on a revolt, which might not be confined to the immediate cause of the revolt. The erecting of huge billboards here, there and everywhere has become such a nuisance that it has aroused the ire of more than the finicky and the fastidious.

"As a matter of fact, I have spent my entire life in trying to bring beauty into the lives of others. In the development of the 'Follies' and the presentation of 'Kid Boots,' 'Sally' and my other productions, I have made every possible effort to delight the eye, the ear and the imagination,—to make beauty so vivid that its memory would linger. So I'm not going to display the names of these plays, which are mediums of beauty, where they will arouse resentment and mar the landscape. From my point of view, the newspaper is the legitimate place for the advertising of the theatre."

He Originated The Teddy Bear

CLIFFORD K. Berryman completed 38 years in Washington, on Aug. 4, and 33 years making cartoons for Washington newspapers. He is now with the Evening Star. He has drawn every politically famous man in the last three decades, many of them, such as Bryan, Roosevelt and Uncle Joe Cannon not once, but literally thousands of times.

C. K. BERRYMAN

Berryman is the only cartoonist who ever drew all the members of one Congress—the fifty-eighth. He belongs to the famous Gridiron Club, and for the past 15 years has done practically all the illustrating for that organization.

He is the originator of the Teddy Bear, that popular and well-behaved little animal with an appealing face, that has won the heart of every beholder. The creation of the Teddy Bear was a flash of inspiration, resulting from a hunting trip President Roosevelt made into Mississippi swamp lands. The game there must have been warned of the great hunter's approach, for he was unable to find a thing worth shooting, much to his disappointment. On the last day, one of his men dashed into camp with news of a real live bear outside. The President seized his gun and dashed out, to find a tall negro with a tiny bear cub on the end of a stout rope. Roosevelt laid down his gun.

"I draw the line. If I were to shoot that little fellow, I couldn't look my own children in the face again," he declared.

Berryman pictured this incident the next afternoon, and entitled his cartoon, "Drawing the Line in Miss." Letters from all sources began to reach him, requesting that he continue the little bear. The President was greatly pleased with his new namesake, which he always called, not the Teddy Bear, but the "Berryman Bear." But Teddy Bear it has been to everyone else, and has now become a steady trade-mark of the Evening Star.

Berryman gives "chalk talks," as he calls them, lectures which he punctuates with quick sketches; and he has illustrated numerous short stories and books, the most recent being "From Corn-field to Press Gallery" by Louis Ludlow, just published.

There is just one thing that interests "Cliff" more than his happily chosen profession, and that is, to make a long putt on the golf course.

WASHINGTON PRESS ELECTS O. K. WOODY PRESIDENT AT SPOKANE MEET

Combined Convention of Pacific Slope Associations Planned for 1926 at Portland—Spokane Dailies Hosts at Luncheon

MEMBERS of Washington Press Association meeting in Spokane, Aug. 22 and 23, abandoned the usual program of formal speeches and cut the entertainment features to the bone, putting in two days at round table discussions and personal experience talks in which all of the 125 editors and publishers attending took an active part. Advertising, circulation and news problems were included in the discussions.

O. K. Woody of the Okanogan Independent was unanimously elected president for the coming year. Roy G. Rosethal of the Montesano Vidette was re-elected secretary, and S. H. Lewis of the Lynden Tribune, treasurer.

Chapin D. Foster, president of the association and editor of the Grandview Herald, presided at the meetings. On Friday the members were guests of the Spokane Chronicle and the Spokesman-Review at a luncheon in the Davenport hotel.

The association's annual banquet was held in the evening. At this time the only formal speech of the convention was delivered by N. W. Durham, editor emeritus of the Spokesman-Review.

The meeting opened with talks by Franklin A. Devoss of the Omak Chronicle, and Lincoln Launsberry of Washington State College at the round table discussion devoted to methods of convincing the small town merchant that advertising in the community paper pays.

Views on the small town editor's problems were expressed by Kay L. Thompson of the Asotin Sentinel and A. R. Nurfin of the Sunnyside Times.

A combined convention of the press associations in California, Oregon, Idaho, Montana and Washington was proposed for 1926 and Portland, Ore., was tentatively selected as the meeting place. Group meetings by states will follow the main convention if present plans materialize.

An entire forenoon was devoted to discussion of National Advertising under the leadership of Fred Kennedy, field manager of the association and professor of Journalism at the University of Washington. Use of mats instead of plates have reduced cost of this advertising 90 per cent he pointed out.

"To make the big advertisers come to you, you must use 100 per cent mat service," he told the country publishers. "I am going to hire the best salesman I can find, pay him $100 a week if necessary, to go over the territory, co-operate with advertising agents, and show you how to advertise."

V. H. Honeyville of the Eatonville Dispatch declared that it is the local advertising that makes possible National Advertising which in turn sells goods for the local merchants.

Joe M. Stoddard of the Waterville Empire Press said editors must learn to understand the problems of every business in their communities and to solicit advertising with a feeling that they are doing a kindness to the advertiser and a service to the community.

During the entire meeting service to the public, development of citizenship, and the need for cohesion among country publishers were emphasized by speakers.

Robert Montgomery of the Puyallup Tribune advocated educational requirements for editors.

"The people should ascertain that those who are educating them through the newspapers have American standards and know the American genius," he declared.

On motion of R. D. Sawyer of the Richland Advocate the Association will have cards printed to send to companies sending out propaganda which will state that upon payment or promise of payment at advertising rates the material will be printed. This plan has been in use for some time by Franklin A. Devoss of the Omak Chronicle.

Newspapers of the state do not pay enough attention to comment on local and state news, G. W. Dodds, managing editor of the Spokane Spokesman-Review said at a luncheon Friday in honor of the visitors given by his paper and the Spokane Chronicle.

Henry Rising, managing editor of the Chronicle also spoke.

intelligence, education, professional capacity and a keen sense of public responsibility.

"If the conception of the newspaper as a private business enterprise should become universal, and it should no longer be regarded as a public trust, I do not see how democratic government is to be carried on."

Dr. Cunliffe attributes to Dr. Talcott Williams, first Director of the School, the conviction that for a number of years the number of professional journalists in the United States has not increased.

A Newspaper Romance

Frank Getty, member of the New York staff of the United Press, was married this week to Maxine Davis, author and head of the Women's National News Bureau, Washington, D. C. The couple met at the National Democratic Convention, in New York.

THE CINCH

(As Seen by the Letter Writer.)

About the easiest job I know
Of all vocations here below
Is running
A paper!
You only have to get the news
And air your editorial views,
Then set 'em up and make a plate
And put it on the press; . . . I'll state
It is the cinch of all the cinches,
To fill a column of twenty inches
And then another, and another,
And lock 'em in, each with its brother,
And start the press, and get some boys
To go outside with a heluva noise
And sell 'em! . . .
You tell 'em

Of all the easy things to make
A wad, the one that takes the cake
Is running
A paper!
Why, I can sit down any time
And do a paragraph in rime,
Or write a letter on anything
Humorous-like, or with a sting!
The Editor, he doesn't do
A thing but read my letter through
And send it up; I think that he
Depends a little too much on me!
I notice, when I'm out of town,
His editorial tone falls down
Like thunder!
No wonder!

The hardest thing one has to do
Is getting the proper point-of-view
In running
A paper.
And that is where my stuff comes in!
I catch him when he gets too thin
And brace him up, and set him right,
And help the Editor see the light!
He pulls a bone. . . . I take my pen
And get him started straight again,
And when my stuff comes out, I note it
Is just exactly as I wrote it!
He doesn't dare to change a line
In that important view of mine!
It fills him
And thrills him!

PREDICTS FEWER NEWSPAPERS

Quality Will Increase as Numbers Dwindle Cunliffe Says

Fewer and better newspapers are predicted by Dr. J. W. Cunliffe, director of the School of Journalism, Columbia University, New York, in the annual report of the school made public last week.

"The pride of the journalist in his profession is not yet dead—very far from it—and this is a most valuable resource which ought to be encouraged and developed for the public advantage," says Dr. Cunliffe.

"Fewer newspapers we are almost certain to have and, with a larger income at their disposal, the survivors ought to be better newspapers. But they will only be better if the men conducting them have

Chicago Daily Worker Raided

Offices of the Chicago Daily Worker, organ of the Workers' Party, was raided and papers seized Aug. 26, by post office inspectors seeking evidence in connection with an alleged lottery. No arrests were made, but Antonio Prosi, editor of Il Lavoratore, an Italian edition, and Alvaro Badillo, business manager, were questioned. Officers of the Daily Worker said the newspaper had no connection with the lottery.

St. Regis Plans New Plant

Ground will be broken about Oct. 1 for a new plant of the St. Regis Pulp and Paper Company near Cape Rouge, Quebec. The ultimate expenditure it is estimated will be between $3,000,000 and $4,000,000.

PENNSYLVANIA DAILY QUITS PUBLICATION

Doylestown (Pa.) Bucks County Daily News Suspends in 108th Year—Publisher Blames Politics—Asks Creditor Leniency

Under the caption, "Please Omit Flowers," the Doylestown (Pa.) Bucks County Daily News suspended publication Aug. 20.

Frederick Blair Jaekel, editor and publisher, printed the following announcement:

"We have done our best to put out a daily local newspaper of sufficient appeal to insure financial return at least equal to the expenditure. The project has failed. Poor business management in the early stages and politics, or lack of them on our part, have contributed the most to our journalistic demise. Our creditors will lose nothing by their leniency."

Mr. Jaekel became owner of the newspaper in January, 1921, when it was one of the influential Democratic organs of the State. Under his ownership the daily dropped the Democratic policy and became Independent.

The new ownership made many extensive improvements to the plant. Circulation was increased from 500 to 2,000, later dropping back to 1,100.

Up until 1816 the Democratic party had no organ in Bucks county, but in that year the Doylestown Democrat, progenitor of the Daily News, appeared under the ownership of Lewis Deffebach & Co. In 1822 it combined with another Democratic paper, the Bucks County Messenger, and Simon Cameron, famous politician, and Benjamin Mifflin were placed in charge. Mr. Cameron later became Secretary of War under Lincoln and Minister to Russia.

The following year the paper was bought by William T. Rogers, who in 1829 sold to M. H. Snyder. Two years later W. H. Powell became publisher, but in 1834 sold to John S. Bryan. Gen. Bryan in turn sold it in 1845 to Samuel J. Paxson, who in turn disposed of it in 1858 to Gen. W. H. H. Davis, in whose possession it remained until 1890, when the Doylestown Publishing Company bought it.

J. C. Dimm, of Juniata County, was the next owner, buying it in 1901, holding it a few years and then selling out to ex-Senator Webster Grim, from whom Mr. Jaekel purchased.

With passing of the Daily News, the town is left with but one daily newspaper, although for many years it had 3 dailies and 5 weeklies. The surviving paper is the Intelligencer, the oldest, which was founded in 1804.

NEBRASKA PRESS OUTING

Serious Discussions Banned at Summer Session in Omaha

About 275 members of the Nebraska Press association and Western Iowa editors held their annual summer outing at Omaha, Aug. 21, 22 and 23. The summer meeting is for fun not business.

Mrs. Marie Weeks of the Norfolk (Neb.) Press, president, called a meeting of the executive committee to consider plans for a "Know Nebraska" campaign which the association is contemplating.

On Friday morning the editors inspected the new Technical high school, later attending a luncheon at which John R. Rogers, inventor of several improvements of the linotype, Mayor Dahlman of Omaha, and Everett Buckingham of the Union Stock Yards were speakers.

Twelve past presidents of the association were present. They were: Charles Poole, Lincoln, 1913; H. A. Brainard, Lincoln, 1914; Horace Davis, Lincoln, 1915; H. G. Taylor, 1912; J. P. O'Furey, Hartington, 1922; J. S. Kroh, Ogallala, 1923; E. R. Purcell, Broken Bow, 1920; H. C. Richmond, Omaha, 1907; W. C. Israel, Havelock, 1919; Congressman Edgar Howard, Columbus Telegraph, 1898; Charles Hubner, Nebraska City, 1895, and Adam Breede, Hastings Tribune, 1903.

NEW AND AUTHENTIC HISTORY OF THE HERALD OF THE BENNETTS

By ALBERT EVANDER COLEMAN—41 Years on the New York Herald staff

The Graham case dragged until Mr. Bennett's lawyers forced action, and on March 20, 1851, John Graham and his brother, DeWitt were indicted by the Grand Jury. The indictments however were promptly pigeonholed, and strange to say, the accused were never brought to trial, whether due to their influence with the court, officials, or to Mr. Bennett's decision to drop the prosecution, cannot be definitely determined, suffice it to say that after the dust of nearly 7 long years had gathered on the papers, on Dec. 12, 1857, on motion of A. Oakey Hall, the then District Attorney, a nolle prosequi was entered on the indictments and the case then and there ended.

Mr. Bennett and Wife Visit Cuba

On Nov. 26, 1850, Mr. and Mrs. Bennett sailed for Havana, leaving Mr. Hudson in charge as acting editor. They were welcomed by Captain General Lopez; were dined at the Palace and attended a grand ball. A Cuban newspaper man in a complimentary vein, wrote:

"We had the pleasure of admiring Mrs. Bennett of New York, so remarkable for her judgment, and whose manifest talents attracted the greatest interest. She was attired with perfect taste, and her exquisite dress was observed with the deepest attention."

Mr. Bennett had gradually placed more and more dependence on the abilities and sound judgment of Mr. Hudson, who was now installed as managing editor, and who relieved the proprietor of the daily routine of publication. During Mr. Bennett's absence in Cuba, Mr. Hudson penned an editorial review of the former's achievements, saying:

"Fifteen years ago the experiment of a new paper, upon a new, practical and comprehensive plan, was commenced in this city. The paper was the New York Herald—its permanent capital was tact, talent and enterprise; founded upon the penny system and cash payments. With that experiment a new era commenced in newspaper history. Success beyond example has crowned it—the system has triumphed over all opposition."

Reverting to Mr. Bennett's activities as a news gatherer, Mr. Hudson referred to his splendidly organized chain of correspondents throughout Europe.

"His first European tour was in 1838. In 1843 he made another; and in 1847 we find Mr. Bennett again upon the Continent, and it is only necessary to turn to the files of the Herald to note the accuracy with which he forecasted events. The revolutions of 1848 were foreshadowed by him, while at home he predicted the election of Zachary Taylor for President."

Mr. Hudson went on to tell of Mr. Bennett's political independence; mentioning how he had attacked President Taylor's Cabinet, due to the discovery of the illegal payment of claims to persons connected with the Government. Secretary of State Clayton had at that time offered Government patronage to the Herald; but as at all other times Mr. Bennett laughed at such attempts to gain the powerful support of his newspaper. On the contrary it only stimulated him to probe with a deeper scrutiny. Toward the President he expressed the kindliest feeling, but against some of his advisers he was bitterly hostile.

Under Mr. Hudson's editorial guidance, the tone of the Herald was raised; its long leaders were dignified discussions of all important political, social and financial questions, and it had now become firmly intrenched as the great representative exponent of American journalism. Mr. Hudson had general control in other ways during Mr. Bennett's absence, and when a young Cuban pardoned by Captain General Lopez came to the Herald office with a startling story of his advzentures. Mr. Hudson promptly paid him $500 for it.

Another eminent journalist of those days was John Nugent, whom Mr. Bennett selected for his resident Washington correspondent. In the 'thirties, the newspapers of the capital arrogated to themselves the right to solely report the proceedings of Congress, and it was only after a long and arduous fight that the Herald obtained entrance to the reporters' gallery for its brilliant representative, Mr. Nugent. While genial as a colleague, yet he was both feared and detested by his fellow correspondents for his success in scoring big "beats" over them, and finally in 1848, he got in trouble and was "detained in custody," by order of the Senate for secretly obtaining copies of the treaty between the United States and Mexico and other documents before they had been officially given out to the press. The Herald's big "scoop" in printing these ahead of its rivals, caused a great outcry, and demand was made, especially by certain New York newspapers that Mr. Nugent be severely punished. Mr. Bennett hurried to Washington on his behalf and in a few days obtained his release, but his usefulness as a correspondent was impaired and he returned to New York, where on April 30, 1849, a complimentary dinner was given him at Delmonico's. The company that assembled consisted chiefly of his associates in the Herald office, Mr. Bennett being present, and in his speech declared that "Mr. Nugent is a gentleman of great intelligence, literary acquirements and unswerving integrity."

Death Removes Mr. Bennett's Worst Enemy

Mr. Bennett must have heaved a sigh of relief, when the decease of Mordecai M. Noah occurred on March 22, 1851. The death notice appeared in the Herald, but the great editor wisely refrained from publishing an obituary or making any editorial comment whatever on the event. The Tribune however in a half column article gave a laudatory sketch of Major Noah, who was a native of Philadelphia, and after serving as Consul at Tunis for a short time, entered journalism in New York, later becoming connected with the old Enquirer, and thus made an intimate personal acquaintance with Mr. Bennett, whom he employed as an editorial writer. After many vicissitudes he established the Evening Star, which after a short career had to suspend. Later he founded the Sunday Times, continuing to edit it up to the time of his death.

Parade of the New York Herald Guard

The young employes of the Herald had formed a military guard, fully equipped with uniforms, arms and accoutrements. Its first parade took place on March 24, 1851. Its officers were as follows: John Connery, Captain; William Marshall, John Falvy and James McGowan, First, Second and Third Lieutenants; John Smyth, Ensign; William Smyth, Orderly Sergeant; Thomas Price and Jacob H. Cohen, Guides. The Guards mustered at Centre Market and marched through Centre, Walker, the Bowery, Chatham, Nassau and Fulton streets, passing and saluting the Herald office, and thence on to Union Square, where at the Union Place Hotel, military compliments were paid to Mrs. James Gordon Bennett. They then proceeded to 109th street at Third avenue for target practice, the following gentlemen acting as judges: Major John Crawley, Major G. Dyckman, Capt. W. H. Underhill, Mr. H. Haywood and Mr. Richard Marshall. The prizes were awarded as follows: a massive silver tankard to Private C. McCusker; a gold watch to Private Scott; a silver watch to Private Stuart; a six barrel revolver to Private Gordon; and "elegant" spring Jenny Lind hats to R. Bevin, T. Bevin and T. Millett.

Dinner was subsequently served at Austin's, while on their return they partook of an "elegant" collation at the Union Hotel—provided by the order of Mrs. Bennett, and marching back to Nassau street, were also "substantially regaled" at Magary's restaurant. Shelton's band accompanied the Guards, and its conductor later composed a new march in their honor.

In the evening a ball was given at Niblos, "and was conducted with perfect decorum. The girls were the most beautiful at any ball of the season."

Mrs. Bennett was to have presented the colors (Mr. Bennett's personal gift), but being indisposed, Benjamin Galbraith, Esq., officiated and said: "I regret exceedingly that from the indisposition of Mrs. Bennett, and the consequent inability of Mr. Bennett to be present, it has developed upon me to address you. Mrs. Bennett has desired me to express the great pleasure that she felt in beholding th fine, manly and war-like appearance which the Herald Guard presented this day while passing the Union Square Hotel. She desires me also to present to you these colors, emblematic of your nationality and to express her hope that should a foreign foe at any future period, ever land on these shores, or should domestic feuds or discord ever disturb this peaceful country, you will array yourselves under this flag, for the country—for the Union—with the same vigor, spirit, bravery and undaunted courage that have characterized from its commencement, the New York Herald. Mrs. Bennett expresses through me, that the colors which she now presents will never be sullied nor parted with under your command, but that the New York Herald Guard may be foremost to defend the Stars and Stripes and support their unsullied glory."

Capt. John Connery returned thanks for the presentation of the flag; expressing his confidence that the colors would never be tarnished by a want of chivalry on the part of the New York Herald Guard.

NO one has ever discovered a substitute for circulation.

The Indianapolis News has the largest circulation in Indiana. It has more home-delivered circulation in Indianapolis than both its daily contemporaries combined.

The Indianapolis News also has 50,000 circulation in the Indianapolis Radius, the trading territory surrounding the city, dotted with prosperous Hoosier farm homes and rich industrial towns.

But The News offers advertisers more than the largest circulation of any Hoosier newspaper. It offers a reader interest and a reader affection that are unique. It offers the prestige of Indiana's acknowledged favorite newspaper. It has an advertising endorsement greater by hundreds of thousands of lines of paid advertising than both its contemporaries combined.

The commonly offered substitutes for circulation are "coverage", "concentration", "class", "prestige", "advertising endorsement", and "reader interest". Forget that The News has the largest circulation in Indiana—it has all the rest. The News has circulation and all the substitutes for it, too.

NEWSPAPER MAKERS AT WORK

By LUCILE BRIAN GILMORE

JAMES P. BICKET—He knows what sells papers.

ABILITY to enforce the discipline which gets copy to the linotypes on time but which involves no harshness—and seldom sternness—is the most typical of the many executive qualities owned by James P. Bicket, assistant managing editor of the Chicago Evening American. This is the impression gained by close observers of his 21 years in four positions of command on the Hearst evening paper of Chicago.

Mr. Bicket's desk is in the city room, and he is acquainted closely with all of the men, from cubs up. The manner in which his personality drives them always to do their best work is the envy of other newspaper executives who have worked with him. He has a reputation for dealing squarely always with his men, is popular among them and never finds it necessary even to approach severity in order to get the job done, it is said.

"As lovable as a woman and as honorable as a Roman senator," is the sincere if somewhat grandiose manner in which a veteran of the American staff described Mr. Bicket.

As for other newspaper traits, his associates tell of Mr. Bicket's never-flagging energy, his unfailing sense of recognizing a good story instantly and his skill at playing it effectively. His 28 years in Chicago newspaper work have given him a fund of information of Chicago and Chicago people such as few men have been able to acquire, and he is a stickler for accuracy.

"His long years as city editor of the American gave M. Bicket an understanding of the task which has made him extremely helpful to the whole city staff," said Edward R. Mahoney, city editor. "One of his fortes is boosting circulation. If there is a story that will sell papers to racetrack fans, he tips the circulation department to send a truckload of papers to the track at Hawthorne. If there's a big West Side story he suggests that extra papers be sent to the stands west of the river."

William Randolph Hearst sent Mr. Bicket a telegram last year congratulating him on the completion of 20 years in the Hearst organization and expressing the hope that he would be in the service another score of years. Other men high in the Hearst organization who honored Mr. Bickett on that occasion were William A. Curley, managing editor; Herman Black, publisher of the American; Roy D. Keehn and Victor H. Polachek.

Mr. Bicket joined the City News Bureau as a cub in June, 1896. Within a short while he became city editor, which post he held until 1903. In September, 1903, when the American was only 3 years old Mr. Bicket went to the paper as assistant city editor. Two years later he was promoted to the city editorship. He remained in that post for 10 years, then served 5 years as news editor and has been assistant managing editor for 4 years.

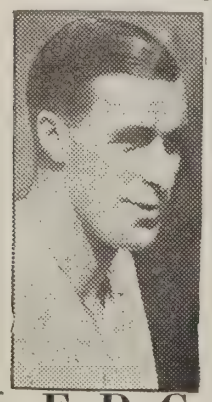
The Bickets have no children. They own a home in the South Shore district of Chicago and a farm in Iowa.

Newspaper work is Mr. Bicket's hobby and life, men who know him best say, although he plays billiards and golf, and pitches horseshoes with great skill on occasion. He is an active Mason, a past master of his Lodge and a Knight Templar.

DAILY FIGHTS SLOT MACHINES

Shamokin (Pa.) News Will Test Law by Operating Machine in Office

The Shamokin (Pa.) Daily News recently issued an advertisement in its columns for a slot machine in first class order and at the same time disclosed its intention to operate the machine in the business office of the publication.



The News said it believes it has the same right to operate the gambling device as barber shops, saloons, pool rooms, etc. The publishers indicated they expected and would welcome arrests with the hope that the police could hardly close one machine without subjecting others in town to the same treatment.

The Shamokin newspaper's idea is being watched with tremendous interest throughout the coal fields where slot machines are numerous. The News is opposed to the machines because it holds they develop the gambling spirit in children. After the machine is installed the News says the proceeds will go to charity.

Fall Selling

THE "dog days" of July and August are over; the August Fur, Furniture, China and what-not half-price sales are fading from the picture. And in the merchant's mind comes the big selling season of the year: Fall.

Fall time is business time—where every activity is directed towards the selling and moving of merchandise. From manufacturer to merchant, floor-walker to cash girl, every fiber is tense, to do business. And advertising must do its bit.

In Cincinnati, the Cincinnati Enquirer offers the big tie-up between your dealers' customers and your product. That is the reason it is being scheduled so much for Fall business in this market.

HOOVER CALLS RADIO CONFERENCE TO DISCUSS BROADCASTING PROBLEMS

Representatives from All Sections of the Field to Meet in Washington Sept. 30—Will Consider White Bill Revisions

By SAM BELL

(Washington Correspondent, EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

WASHINGTON, D. C., Aug. 27.—Interconnection of radio broadcasting stations so that all sections of the country can hear programs and news events of national interest will be one of the major proposals to come up for consideration at the radio conference called by Secretary Hoover for Sept. 30.

Thus far, experiments in interconnection of the big stations in the broadcasting of political conventions and speeches has not included the Far West, because of the expense involved in the re-broadcasting which makes it possible for those with smaller receiving sets to listen in. In addition to the expense, there is shortage of wires across the mountains, but physically it can be done. Theoretically, broadcasting could be picked up by the local stations and the program re-broadcast in that way, but experience has shown that the use of wires for interconnection is desirable if satisfactory results are to be obtained.

Even with the best sets for radio reception, it is not always possible to get long range stations when desired or with clarity, officials say, and thus for the time being the local station must be relied upon to give either a program of its own composition or the re-broadcast of program that is of sufficient interest to warrant its transmission over the wires.

Realization by federal officials that the local station, at least in the present state of radio development, can give the greatest service will result in careful consideration on the part of the conference, of ways and means of protecting local stations now in the broadcasting business.

"One of the present problems, therefore, is to make the local stations as efficient as possible," said Secretary Hoover in commenting on the conference which also will consider such technical matters as:

Revision of the present frequency or wave length allocations, to reduce interference.

Use of high frequencies or short waves.

Classification of broadcasting stations and possible discontinuance of Class C. stations.

Limitation of power; division of time; zoning of broadcasting stations.

Means for distinguishing the identity of amateur calls from foreign countries.

Interference by electrical devices other than radio transmitting stations.

Relations between government and commercial services, and such other topics as may be proposed by the conference.

The various groups in the radio field will be asked by the Government to name representatives to constitute the formal advisory committee of the conference. As planned at present those groups will be composed of listeners, marine service, broadcasting (one from each district), engineering, trans-oceanic communication, wire interconnections, manufacturers, amatuers, point-to-point communication, and government departments.

"The committee so constituted," said the Secretary of Commerce, "will hold public hearings and all persons and organizations having suggestions will be expected to present them."

In the absence of the radio legislation which the Department of Commerce for 3 years has been asking Congress to enact giving it proper authority to cope with the situation, the conference so far as Mr. Hoover is concerned is advisory and its conclusions as to matters not within the regulatory powers of the secretary, can only be made effective by voluntary action.

The White bill, which has been before Congress at the last two sessions, and by which the Department of Commerce would be given greater control over broadcasting, will be considered again by the conference and such changes to the measure as seem desirable in the light of the developments of recent months will be suggested. A revised draft of the bill will be presented to Congress at the December session.

EDITORIAL

DRASTIC, BUT DESERVED

ONE can picture the elder Bennett, tongue in cheek, disdainfully exposing in the Herald, the Sun's "Moon Hoax" some 80 years ago. The fake gave him just one of many opportunities to hack at the structure of a competitor, while directing public attention to the strength of his own edifice. We rather doubt that his moral sense was shocked. Nor is it of record that the Sun was disturbed, either in conscience or in public favor, by Bennett's revelations. The newspaper man of 1840 could safely believe that morals' place was in the home.

That a stricter creed prevails today has been evidenced often during the past 10 years, but never more forcefully than by the Herald-Tribune's "dishonorable dismissal" of a faking reporter and its public announcement of that fact.

The penalty is Draconian, but it could not have been milder. The reporter was ordered to verify a tip that a floating "rum palace," anchored off Long Island, beyond the 12-mile limit, was serving liquor to all comers. The rumor is almost as old as the prohibition law, but this time it came from an unusually reliable source. Mr. Reporter spent two days on Long Island, reported to the office that he had visited the ship, watched the revelry, and had a "whale" of a story. He was directed to write it. Page One, a by-line, and a copyright slug were his, over a story whose wealth of detail and "eye-witness" notes struck distress to the heart of every city editor and prohibition officer in the district. The story had the ring of true metal. It shaped up like a candidate for a Pulitzer prize. It was picked up [illegible] very New York paper and carried on press association wires as big news.

Confronted at last with evidence that his fake had been detected, the reporter confessed, resigned, and left town. Most newspapers would have dropped the matter there, rejoicing that no libel suit remained as a souvenir. No law compelled the Herald-Tribune to acknowledge its fault and to send forth branded the man who had mislaid his decency and common sense. That the newspaper did both is worthy of highest commendation, and does, as Heywood Broun somewhat flippantly observes in the World, preserve the ethics of journalism.

Mr. Broun will find it hard to defend his belief that, while faking cannot be condoned, this faker receives too severe a sentence. He cites the 1914 dispatches from Belgium that the German army was being slaughtered, the curious news received from Russia since the war, including the many deaths Lenin died before his final summons. These, says Mr. Broun, are fakes whose authors went unnamed and unpunished. No doubt he could have recalled others, but in the cases he mentioned, there is at least the presumption that the reporters were trying to get the truth under extraordinary conditions of war and censorship and that they had to take what information they could get when they could get it. Thin as this presumption is, not even it exists for the former Herald-Tribune man.

He was no untried cub, facing discharge if he reported "no story." He was experienced in New York and other cities and had been with the Tribune for almost two years. He must have known that his fabrication could serve no public good and that its inevitable detection would do himself, his newspaper and the profession untold harm.

If editors are to tolerate or palliate deliberate faking, they may as well forget their codes of professional conduct. Pipe dreams don't belong in newspapers which bar even the semblance of untruth from their advertising columns.

ST. MARK

CHAPTER VII. 15

There is nothing from without a man, that entering into him can defile him: but the things which come out of him, those are they that defile the man.

THE DERELICT

NEARLY 25 years ago we worked desk to desk in the little three-story brick Sun office, corner of Park Row and Frankfort street, with a live-wire news man. The "boss" had brought him in from an up-state town because he liked his mail copy.

Happy, keen and a great hustler, he made rapid strides. He had a warm sentimental side and we well recall his talk of his mother and sister and his frequent week-end trips to see them. He was a gentleman in his dealings with associates. Newspaper work to him was a public service. He was essentially an idealist.

Changing newspaper tides swept us apart and we had not seen or even heard of the man for more than 20 years—until last week.

He came up through Frankfort street and turned north toward the Bowery. Although his face was red and bloated, we recognized him instantly. His blue Irish eye signalled a friendly "hello"—and then quickly turned aside. He shuffled on. He saw him pause, for an instant, as if to return and speak, but a hasty decision to the contrary drove him into the crowds at Brooklyn Bridge and we saw him no more.

He did not need to return to tell us his bitter story. Every line of his broken body proclaimed him a victim of booze. His shattered garments, sour with age and exposure and filthy contamination, marked him as just another "bum" on Park Row.

What demon is this which enters so fine a structure, eats away all that is good and then parades the hideous wreck!

Thank God, civilized man has decided to banish it from the earth.

Keep abreast of the swiftly-changing newspaper tides by studying journalistic theory and general experience in the pages of Editor & Publisher! The professional man cannot throw away his books when he hangs out his shingle.

LOCAL NEWSPAPERS

LONDON newspapers command circulation among a population of 40,000,000. Density of English population is about 700 to the square mile. United States density of population is 31 to the square mile.

So-called "daily" (meaning morning) newspapers in England have a combined circulation of 9,500,000; evening papers have 6,500,000; Sunday papers have between 11,000,000 and 12,000,000.

Among the London daily and Sunday papers there are several with circulations running from 700,000 to 3,000,000.

It was long ago predicted that when airplanes became as thick in the air as flivvers on the roads, great American metropolitan dailies would obtain circulations in the millions. But there is no sign of this at present. Various obvious economic obstacles are in the way and the basic fact is that our "provinces" do not need to look to the great cities for competent newspapers, for every first and second-class city in America possesses newspapers which not only fill the local news need, but also contain features on a par with the best published in any city.

Those who would turn back to the "good old days" in journalism, in order to avoid syndicate standardization, would have the people of the small cities of America reading cheap "grape-vine" or making a double investment in local and metropolitan papers.

Correct your errors, in full justice to readers, but don't retract by publishing critical letters from persons who merely want axes ground for their own use.

SENSATIONALISM

G. K. CHESTERTON says that the worst "sensationalism" is not merely publishing reports of crime. We all like that kind of sensationalism, he declares, and points to the great murder stories of "Hamlet" and "Macbeth" as evidences of the popularity of tragic description.

The worst journalism, according to the brilliant English writer, is that which prevents people from thinking. It does not stimulate, but rather inhibits thought. The right kind of newspaper teaches the reader how to use his mind, whereas the wrong kind enervates the mental machine, causing the reader's emotional and sentimental faculties to run wild and lose control of muscular powers which ought to control the mind.

"Have something to say and say it," is Brisbane's complete formula.

INFORMED SALESMEN

THE publisher sends a salesman into the field to represent his publication. Is he prepared, by reason of sound knowledge of plans and policies, to speak truly and convincingly? If he is a new man is he permitted to stumble about, at the expense of clients' time and patience, until he finds his story? If he is an old employe, is he permitted to go on repeating old mistakes? Is there any standardized and approved sales argument which such men might learn, by attending a staff meeting or by having an occasional intimate talk with the publisher?

In big organizations the plan of issuing sales manuals for the guidance of salesmen is becoming more and more popular. For instance, in the Hearst organization there are standard sales manuals for local, classified and foreign advertising and for circulation solicitors, containing the essential points which naturally arise in the ordinary sales talk.

One advertising manager known to us, has for years made it a practice to call his staff into his private office on occasion for rehearsal. A salesman is asked to give his talk to his superior as he would speak it before an advertising prospect. This little performance is in good humor, is truly constructive and the entire staff consequently works in harmony and with unusual effectiveness.

The worst sort of mismanagement is that which permits of misrepresentation because of an uninformed or a misinformed salesman.

Starting his business career as a manufacturer with the Kemper-Thomas Company, Cincinnati, Mr. Sanger in 1910 organized and headed his own advertising agency in Los Angeles, known as the Sanger Advertising Service Company. He remained in this work 7 years and then joined the United States Department of Commerce.

As trade commissioner, Mr. Sanger had only recently returned to this country from a visit to Australia, where he studied conditions with a view to promote the sale of American manufactures on that continent. He specialized for the government in advertising, merchandising, and newspaper investigations, and in this connection also made a survey of South American countries including Bolivia, Argentina, Urguay, and Brazil.

Soon he was sent to the Troy office of the Knickerbocker Press and did so well that in 1923 he was promoted to assistant classified advertising manager.

Blanchard a short while ago learned the Utica Press had no classified manager. He wrote a letter of application and within 4 weeks landed the job

WHAT'S WHAT IN THE FEATURE FIELD

LOWELL THOMAS, former newspaper man, traveller and lecturer, is writing a series of articles on his experiences with Colonel Lawrence in Arabia for the McClure Newspaper Syndicate, New York. The articles tell how the Colonel, a young Oxford graduate, transformed desert tribesmen into an army, defeating the Turks.

LOWELL THOMAS

Thomas' own life has been full of action. Born in a little Ohio town, his father joined the "Pike's Peak or Bust" gold rush to Cripple Creek, Col. and the boy grew up surrounded by hardships. He worked his way through Valparaiso University as janitor, cook in a short-order restaurant, real estate and book agent. Then he spent a year in newspaper work on the Cripple Creek (Col.) Times and other Colorado newspapers.

During the war, Thomas with his assistants took thousands of photographs along the Western front. He went into Jerusalem with Allenby, followed by his adventures with Lawrence.

JOSEPH CONRAD was writing an article for newspapers of the United States and Canada the day before he died. Before he went on the motor ride during which he was fatally stricken he brought the article to its present form. With editor's notes of how it was being written, and with a facsimile of the concluding paragraph in Mr. Conrad's hand and a facsimile of his signature, the article is to be syndicated by the Metropolitan Newspaper Service.

Max Elserf, Jr., of the Metropolitan Service had concluded arrangements in London for the article on July 29, Mr. Conrad having stated that he expected to have it finished "in a few days." On Aug. 2, Mr. Conrad rose from his desk where he had written the last part of the article. He went motoring. He was seized with his fatal illness, and died the next day.

Eric Pinker, Mr. Conrad's literary agent, and the son of James B. Pinker, who "discovered" and financed Conrad years ago, cabled the article to Metropolitan and then sent the manuscript and signature facsimile for reproduction. The article deals with heroism at sea. In New York it will be published by the Times.

V. V. McNitt, president of the McNaught Newspaper Syndicate, plans to return to New York Sept. 2 from his summer home in Palmer, Mass., and will start next week making up a schedule of new fall features. Considerable material is now on hand from which a selection will be made.

When Russ Westover, creator of "Tillie the Toiler," arrived in San Francisco with Mrs. Westover for a visit recently, he confessed all sorts of things to newspaper men who interviewed him for the 'Frisco dailies.

In the first place Russ admitted "Tillie" would never marry. He said she would always be the same old flapper, wearing out her nose with powder.

"How does Tillie dress that way on a stenog's slender salary? Ah, that—that is the mystery. How does she do it? But you know, some girls can make ten dollars go as far as fifty.

"No, she doesn't wear homemade clothes. They haven't the snap—the snap that she demands. But she has the benefit of Mrs. Westover's style ideas, and then—my office overlooks Broadway.

"She's developing all the time—perhaps in a little while she'll be quite different.

"They say she is exaggerated, that girls don't powder their noses so much and 'doll up.' Well, I don't know—I get most of my ideas about girls from Mrs. Westover. I don't know much about them."

Mrs. Westover is said to be the model for Tillie.

Fred R. Marvin, editor of the Searchlight Department of the New York Commercial, has written a series of articles on "La Folletteism Is Socialism" for the Interstate Commercial News Service, New York.

Ken Kling, creator of Joe and Asbestos, is at Saratoga to get the red hot racing dope and incorporate it in his strip. This comic by the way is a new idea in the field. Starting with a measely "tenner," Joe and his colored buddie have, by careful adhesion to the right dope, run their combined fortunes up to an imposing five hundred odd simoleons. Racing fans all over are enthusiastic over the varying fortunes of the pair.

Earle J. Hadley, vice-president of the Metropolitan Newspaper Service, New York, spent August on vacation near Southampton, L. I.

Al Posen, creator of "Jingle Belles," a comic strip, is on vacation near Edinburgh, N. Y., where he is drawing his cartoons in fields near his summer home.

Nanette Kutner will be one of the feature writers for the new Macfadden Newspaper Syndicate. She will conduct a column on the New York Evening Graphic also.

Willie Hoppe, world's champion at billiards, has sold his life story to the Metropolitan Newspaper Service, New York, for syndication.

WHAT THEY ARE SAYING

THE ECLIPSE OF JOSEPH

"'AND Joseph died, and there arose a new king in Egypt which knew not Joseph.'

"I submit, gentlemen, that this is one of the most staggering lines which has ever been written in a business biography. Here was a man so famous that everybody knew him and presto, a few people die, a few new ones are born, and nobody knows him. The tide of human life has moved on; the king who exalted the friends of Joseph is followed by a king who makes them slaves; all the advertising that the name 'Joseph' had enjoyed in one generation is futile and of no avail, because that generation is gone. * * * Cultivating good-will is a day-by-day and hour-by-hour business, gentlemen. Every day and every hour the 'king' dies and there arises a new 'king' to whom you and all your works mean absolutely nothing."—Bruce Barton.

CHURCHES SHOULD ADVERTISE

"EVERY church should have a fund for purchasing space in the newspapers and should advertise in the daily or weekly newspapers regularly, persistently and consistently. Many churches have editors, writers and advertising experts who could be used in preparing news or advertising for the newspapers. It pays to advertise, as hundreds of preachers and churches have demonstrated by increased attendance and larger collections, as well as larger publicity. Churches should not 'sponge' on the newspapers. The space in the newspapers must be sold to pay the running expenses of the paper and the churches should advertise their ware as earnestly and as systematically as the business man."—Rev. J. T. Brabner Smith of Chicago, before Garrett Biblical Institute, Summer School, Evanston, Ill.

NEWSPAPERS MUST SERVE THE PUBLIC

"NEWSPAPERS that do not serve the public and labor for the public good are doomed to failure, even though they may have great financial or political groups behind them. It has been proved over and over again that unless a paper serves the common good rather than special inerests, it cannot succeed. Newspapers must stand for better schools, better homes, better opportunities for the young, better parks, better streets, a better everything, if they are to live up to their opportunities for usefulness, and if they are to succeed ultimately."—D. D. Moore, Publisher, Fort Worth Record, before Fort Worth Lions Club.

SHAW NOW BUSINESS MANAGER

New York State Press Secretary Joins Middletown Times-Press

JAY W. SHAW, general secretary of the New York State Press Association, has been appointed business manager of the Middletown (N. Y.) Times-Press. John D. Schultz will continue in charge of the advertising department and Elmer E. Decker will remain as head of the subscription department.

JAY W. SHAW

Shaw started newspaper work with the Syracuse Herald, leaving later to become editor of the Geneva Daily Times. From Geneva he went to the Elmira Advertiser and from there to the Binghamton Republican.

On leaving the Republican Mr. Shaw began specializing in circulation work. He built up an extensive organization to carry on this work and operated in many states. During these years, he bought and reorganized and sold two weekly newspaper properties.

In the early part of 1918, Shaw went to Bloomsburg, Pa., to reorganize the Daily Sentinel. It was while with that newspaper that some capitalists in Geneva persuaded him to take the management of the new daily there—the Daily News. This he did, building what was thought to be the best small city daily in the state within a few months. He remained with the Geneva property until the merger of the Times and News. After a brief rest, Mr. Shaw again took up newspaper work in 1920, adding advertising features to his circulation activities.

In 1922, the New York State Press Association named Mr. Shaw as its general secretary, and he assumed executive control of the organization.

PREPARING PROGRAM FOR INLAND MEET

Perry of Adrian Telegram Will Discuss Misuse of Contempt Power by Judges at Chicago Convention Oct. 14-15

Topics of vital interest to the newspaper publisher are on the program for discussion at the October meeting of the Inland Daily Press Association at Chicago, on Oct. 14-15. The meeting is expected to be unusually well attended because it is to be immediately followed by the annual sessions of the A. B. C. and the A. A. A. A., and many editors and publishers are planning to take advantage of the opportunity of attending all three.

One of the most important subjects to be discussed concerns the growing misuse of contempt of court power by judges. Stuart H. Perry of the Adrian (Mich.) Telegram will take up the matter both from the standpoint of the newspaper and also the law.

Former Governor Frank O. Lowden of Illinois will be the guest of honor at luncheon on Oct. 15, and will speak on the "Relation of the Newspaper to the New Farm Era."

Other speakers scheduled to appear before the meeting are John Sullivan, secretary and treasurer of the A. N. A., Frank T. Carroll, president of the Newspaper Advertising Executives Association, H. L. Williams, secretary of the Illinois State Press Association and Prof. William G. Bleyer of the University of Wisconsin.

TYPOGRAPHY AND MAKE-UP

sary is the supervision of someone who is interested enough to sit on the job and see to it that all the advertising details are properly organized in the form of a striking layout—and then into an effective piece of composition.

These suggestions are offered to publishers as an urgent request to see that all advertisements of newspapers (whether appearing in the newspaper's own columns or other mediums) average above, rather than below, the uniformly high standards of commercial products. At least, the newspaper's own advertising should equal in typographic quality the general standards of competing mediums.

There are reproduced three specimens of newspaper advertising which are splendid examples of fine practical use of type and design. It would be very difficult to suggest any improvement. Each advertisement incorporates careful organization, good illustrations and design, and thoughtful use of type.

Accompanying this installment are expressions from master typographers emphasizing the importance of typography in advertising. A careful reading of these "ideals" will surely encourage a greater appreciation of type on the part of newspaper executives responsible for the typography of their papers, and ought to inspire a more sincere effort to improve newspaper typography and make-up.

"FISHING and trying to do something to help the country press."

Not being superstitious, Scarborough moved to Franklin, Va., on Friday, Oct. 13, 1905, to establish and edit the Tidewater News. He has been there ever since. From 1917 to 1921 he was postmaster at Franklin, and in addition his position on the Virginia Press Association, is also president of the local Rotary Club. New York News Men Make Plans to Greet Royal Visitor

How to get news of the Prince of Wales while he is on his holiday trip to this country was bothering New York newspaper men this week.

His Royal Highness has let it be known that he does not care to have the gentlemen of the press dogging his heels, and the estate on Long Island, where he plans to stay is placed miles from everywhere.

Press Association representatives and New York newspaper men were to meet Thursday night with Major Solbert, U. S. A., assigned to the Prince's staff by the U. S. government to make arrangements for daily press contact.

Newspaper men assigned to cover His Highness when he arrives in New York included: Frank Getty, United Press; Roland Krebs, International News Service; Oliver H. P. Garrett, New York World; and Fred B. Edwards, of the New York Tribune.

Hayden Talbot of the London bureau of the Universal Service, sailed on the Berengaria with the Prince. A group of London newspaper men were also aboard the liner, among them being Trevor C. Wigmall of the London Daily Mail and George Smith of the London Press Association.

AMERICA'S LINKS with HOLLAND

The American visitor to Europe should not overlook the historical link which exists between Holland and his own country. It was to Amsterdam that, in 1608, John Robinson, the Puritan divine, fled from Norwich to escape persecution. He later became pastor of a church at Leyden, where he formed the idea of a Puritan Colony in America, and it was largely owing to his efforts that the Pilgrim Fathers sailed, though he himself remained behind. Robinson, therefore, has a very strong claim upon all patriotic Americans, and to visit the old-world cities of Holland is a pleasant pilgrimage which has much to recommend it over and above the satisfaction it brings of having paid tribute to the memory of the man who was the "father" of the Pilgrim Fathers.

Three Great Features For The Coming Year!

MRS. J. ROSITA FORBES is going to Arabia. She is going to visit the land of the Queen of Sheba and other remote parts of Arabia that have never before been visited by white people. Lord Burnham, proprietor of the London Telegraph, is financing her expedition. Mrs. J. Rosita Forbes will write a series of articles totaling approximately ninety thousand words in length, about her adventures in this romantic country. The articles will be profusely illustrated with photographs.

DR. CARLETON SIMON, Special Deputy Police Commissioner of the Narcotics Division, is writing the first authentic inside story of drugs, the drug rings, and the traffic in narcotics. This will be a series of 20 weekly articles illustrated with heretofore unobtainable photographs of raids, addicts, and seizures. Dr. Carleton Simon is recognized as the world's foremost authority on narcotics. He has spent his life fighting the terrors of drugs throughout the world, and this series, that reads like a tale from the Arabian Nights, contains the high spots of a life time.

MITCHELL HEDGES, the well known archeologist, is leading an expedition to the lost city of Maya in Honduras. He is being accompanied by Lady Richmond Brown and Dr. Gann. This expedition is under the auspices of the British Museum and has been accorded government protection. They are equipped with sufficient finances to assure them of success, and we are sure you appreciate the tremendous value of the discoveries they will probably make.

At the present moment, we are not in a position to submit copy to you on any one of these features, though we are able to supply you with further and more detailed information about anyone that you may be interested in. As territory is already closing very rapidly on all these features, we suggest that you wire your option to us immediately to avoid disappointment.

FRENCH MARKET WAITS DEVELOPMENT BY AMERICAN MANUFACTURERS

But Local Customs and Buying Habits Should Be Thoroughly Studied to Forestall Failures, Agency Man Declares

By WALTER S. MAAS
Director of the Dorland Agency, Paris.

ADVERTISING problems in France are so different from those encountered in America that no American producer should enter the French field without first consulting expert advertising specialists with a thorough knowledge of French advertising. Not to do so is to court failure, and even if the campaign succeeds in spite of all it will succeed only after an excessive expenditure of time and money.

The first thing that the American advertiser must ascertain before attempting to place his product upon a foreign market is whether a demand can really be created for it. There are many commodities which are in daily use in the United States, but for which no amount of advertising could create a demand in Europe, because customs and traditions are so different here. Frenchmen, for instance, except the poorer classes, insist on tailor-made clothes, and manufacturers of ready-made clothes would have great difficulty in entering the French market on a large scale. Despite the great advertising given chewing gum during the war by American soldiers, and a determined campaign on the part of American manufacturers since, it is very doubtful if the French can be induced to become a nation of gum chewers.

Many American products fail to become popular abroad because of equally insurmountable difficulties. In many cases it is prohibitive tariff duties which make it impossible for the American producers to compete, no matter how low their cost of production. The bulk of certain articles is a permanent bar to their extensive exportation. Americans seeking a market abroad should first obtain a complete market investigation from a reliable source. The amount of time and money the Dorland Agency spends on such investigation is considerable.

France, especially since the war, likes American products and demands them in ever increasing quantities and there are a thousand and one products which could be successfully marketed in France by judicious advertising.

The success of American kodaks, fountain pens, patent pencils, razors and other articles amply proves this fact. So successfully have these American products penetrated the French field that they are generally given preference over the home-made articles. Of course more extensive and continuous advertising is required to make the great mass of French people use fountain pens in preference to ordinary pens, adopt patent pencils for every day use or shave with safety razors.

Many American products fill a want already existing in France and other European countries and have only to be offered attractively to be in instant demand. There is a great opportunity, for American producers and advertisers open in this direction, which if they do not seize will be lost by the fact that foreign manufacturers have already met the demand.

Take the matter of the multitude of labor-saving devices for housewives. Since the war France, and in fact all Europe has been suffering from an acute housing crisis. Large apartments are unobtainable except at exorbitant prices. Servants are almost as scarce. Housewives have therefore only to be made acquainted with the many devices in common use in American homes and manufactured superiorly in America to buy them. Electric irons, vacuum and patent cleaners, patent mops, space-saving furniture, and the multitude of other economical, rapid and labor-saving devices are lacking to most Europeans and could be easily sold abroad.

Since the war American cigarettes and tobaccos have been very popular abroad. The doughboys created a market which the big manufacturers are only beginning to utilize. The demand has only to be developed by advertising. The same applies to American candies and chocolates, although these will encounter a keener competition.

American canned foods would find a great market abroad if properly advertised, as canning in France and other countries is undeveloped as an industry. There are few well-known French brands of condensed milk, and there is no reason why American manufacturers should not share the market with the Swiss producers. A market might also be created for certain brands of millers' products and flours.

A considerable demand for high-grade American shoes has been developed in France, but there is no reason why American manufacturers of cheap and medium grade shoes should not compete more with British and other foreign makers who furnish a large percentage of the shoes worn in France.

A demand is open for underwear and artificial and pure silk stockings, only to mention two of the many articles of clothing that might be sold in France.

I do not understand why American manufacturers of trunks, who certainly produce as good an article as most French products, have not entered the French market. There is a great opportunity for many other articles used by tourists.

I believe that sales of American farm implements and machinery of all kinds could be increased by more extensive advertising, and the same would apply to building materials and supplies. I might go on, but have said sufficient, I believe, to prove that the French field is both wide and fertile.

NINTH DISTRICT CLUBS HOLD TENT MEETING

R. E. Shannon Named President at Washington, Ia., Meet, Aug. 25-27 —Carl Hunt, J. W. Fisk, J. A. Austin Among Speakers

An innovation in advertising meetings was recorded this week when members of the Ninth District, A. A. C. W., held their annual convention in a large auditorium tent at Washington, Ia., and "camped out" during the sessions in smaller tents nearby equipped with running water, and electric lights.

The meeting was opened Monday night with a smoker and stunt program. Every delegate was given a cob pipe made from Iowa's tall corn and a package of tobacco. A boxing match and vaudeville sketches occupied the evening.

R. E. Shannon of Washington, Ia., was named district president in the election held Wednesday. Graham Stuart of Des Moines was elected vice-president and I. Rothchild of Iowa City secretary and treasurer.

Tuesday's sessions were opened by an address of welcome by Mayor Alberson, which was responded to by Victor Martin, district president during the past year. The first speaker on the program was Carl Hunt, New York, general manager of the A. A. C. W., who spoke of the progress of the Association and sketched briefly the high lights of the recent London convention. He was followed by Fred. P. Mann of Devils Lake, N. D. In the afternoon James A. Austin, advertising manager of the Omaha Bee discussed newspaper advertising. J. W. Fisk, head of the merchandising counsel department of the Milwaukee Journal talked on merchandising.

In the evening J. W. Coverdale, national secretary of the Farm Bureau spoke on farm conditions and explained what the recent grain merger will mean to the grain growers of the middle west.

At the opening session Wednesday, a message from Lou Holland, president of the A. A. C. W. was read. Immediately following W. H. Nelson, president of the Iowa Dry Goods and Apparel Association spoke on "Organization," from the retailer's standpoint.

John Blaul, one of Iowa's foremost wholesale grocers talked on the advantages of the lake to gulf waterway.

Among the afternoon speakers was Frank H. French of the French Advertising Agency, Cedar Rapids.

The convention closed with a banquet Wednesday night.

NEWSPAPER CODE OF ETHICS APPLIES TO MOVIE PRESS AGENTS—HAYS

And Editors Shouldn't Be Deceived by False Publicity Claims, Says Dictator—Salacious Advertising Condemned

CHARACTERIZING the motion picture as "the younger brother of the press" and declaring that those connected with the picture industry had quite as much responsibility to the public as have the reporters and editors and publishers of newspapers, Will H. Hays, advisor to the motion picture industry, gave a talk on the subject of clean publicity and advertising at the ninth annual meeting of the Associated Motion Picture Advertisers at the Cafe Boulevard Thursday. The affair was in the form of a luncheon and was attended by the publicity and advertising men who make up the Association and by a number of picture producers. Arthur Brisbane was another guest of honor. About 200 were present.

Mr. Hays declared that the movie publicity men—most of whom are former newspaper men—should have in their stories offered for publication the same degree of truth and intelligence as they put into their stories when they were staff writers on daily journals. He said they should hold themselves to the same code of ethics that are demanded of newspaper men, even though the newspapers have achieved their present high status only after 300 years of existence, while the movies are only a little more than 20 years old.

He pointed out that a recent census of the picture industry revealed the fact that there are more than 700 former newspaper men and women engaged in writing, producing, directing and publicizing pictures, some of them in executive positions of high responsibility.

Almost unanimously, he said, the press of the United States has been a real "big brother" to the movies, has stood beside them when their just liberties were attacked and has encouraged them nobly in both their commercial and artistic development.

Those who make, who publicize and who exhibit pictures owe a definite debt of gratitude to the press, he pointed out, and since all these elements had promised the newspapers that pictures should continually be better and cleaner, it was up to them to square their performances with their promises.

Pictures themselves are in the main devoid of salaciousness and unwholesome atmosphere, Mr. Hays told his hearers, but frequently the advertising and publicity accompanying them sought to give another impression. Of 660 pictures of feature length made last year, only about 60 might be criticized at all and only about 6 were downright bad, he said; but there were many cases where salacious titles and salacious advertising gave the false impression that the pictures they accompanied were of an evil nature. This was not only morally wrong, he added, but was downright dishonest, as it was obtaining money under false pretenses from those who thought they were going to see racy pictures, and then didn't see them.

Publicity of the "big money" type, although it is not so prevalent now as it was formerly, is dangerous and damaging to the industry, he told the press agents. Within the past year a story was sent out and carried by newspapers to the effect that Baby Peggy, a child star, was to receive a salary of $1,000,000. This was regarded as a great publicity stunt, even though it was untrue. The result was that a certain State, which needed revenue, immediately imposed taxation upon the movie interests, saying "If they can afford to give a child a million dollars, they can afford to kick in toward our expenses."

Newspapers should not fall for stories that stars are getting immense salaries or that productions are costing millions of dollars, Mr. Hays advised. He said he felt that news concerning pictures and those who appear in them is legitimate news and well worthy of a place in any newspaper's columns, since the movies are an accepted part of the everyday lives of our American people. But it should be genuine news and not bunk.

He told his audience that the producers of pictures belonging to his Association, the Motion Picture Producers and Distributors of America, had pledged themselves to refrain from using salacious titles and to refrain from making pictures based upon unwholesome themes. At the same time, it was not intended that punch and pep should be taken out of pictures or that they should all be adapted to the 14 year old child. But suggestiveness and filth would most certainly be kept out, he declared.

"Every effort is being made," said Mr. Hays, "to see to it that the more or less prevalent type of novel or stage play does not become the prevalent type of motion picture. It may do no harm for the sophisticates, who hold to the ultra-modern beliefs and practices, but our pictures go to everyone in the country—to 60,000,000 weekly and these include not only the sophisticates but the plain folks, who are in the great majority and who hold firmly to the decent and conventional things of life."

Mr. Brisbane declared that Mr. Hays was right and that the truth in advertising and in newspaper publication was the only element that could lead to permanent success.

At the end of the meeting, the members of the A. M. P. A. passed a resolution unanimously endorsing Mr. Hays' stand and pledging to him their cooperation individually and collectively.

Rock Island Argus Begins Construction of $300,000 Home

Ground was broken Aug. 23, for the new $300,000 home of the Rock Island (Ill.) Argus, of which John W. Potter is publisher. The new plant will be completed and ready for occupancy by May 1, next.

The Argus has had a new home under contemplation for several years, having long outgrown its present quarters. The building now being erected will be the first plant the newspaper has had for its exclusive use in the 73 years of its existence.

The building will be two stories high, of pressed brick with Bedford stone facings, standing on a lot measuring 77 by 170 feet.

A $60,000 press is now under construction for the Argus at the factory of the Duplex Printing Press Company, Battle Creek, Mich. The contract calls for delivery early next spring.

TO ADD TO CHAIN

Enwright Says He Plans Purchase of N. Y. Evening Daily

Frederick W. Enwright, publisher of the New York Evening Bulletin, the Boston Telegram, and the Lynn (Mass.) Telegram News, is planning formation of a corporation with a view to purchasing three new dailies to add to his chain, he announced this week.

Although he refused to make names of the newspapers public, he stated one was a New York evening paper and the other two were dailies in small Massachusetts towns.

The new company will have as officers in addition to Mr. Enwright, Mrs. Eleanor M. Enwright, his wife, and Walter H. T. Enwright, his brother. It will be capitalized at $3,500,000, Mr. Enwright said.

Rumor in New York had it the New York Evening Telegram and Mail was the evening newspaper for which Mr. Enwright was negotiating. This was immediately denied on the return of Frank A. Munsey, who arrived from abroad on the Homeric, Aug. 27.

Fred A. Walker, publisher of the Telegram-Mail, who went down to Quarantine to meet Mr. Munsey, was emphatic in his denial of the rumor and even expressed doubt that there was any New York evening newspaper that Mr. Enwright could buy. Certainly, Mr. Walker said, there were no negotiations on or in prospect with any one for the purchase of the Telegram-Mail.

Mr. Munsey said briefly that he had no intention of selling the Telegram-Mail.

HOME TOWN DAILY SMILES AS BIG CITY PAPERS "WILD 'EM UP"

Mysteries Bloom and Personalities Grow Vivid When Small City Story Hits Front Page of Metropolitan Press —Sensations "Made-to-Order"

By HAROLD ROBINSON

SMALL city newspapers especially ones within the shadow of large cities have many problems to solve that are seldom given much thought or consideration by the public in general. One of these problems is the handling of news stories that are "played up" by the big city newspapers much to the embarrassment of the newspaper and the editor where the story originates. The big city newspaper carries the story with streamer headlines—makes a sensation where there are little or no grounds for so doing. If there is a girl in the case of course she is beautiful, accomplished, vivacious and teeming with personality. If her father is an ordinary citizen holding perhaps a small appointed office, he is played up in the big city newspaper as a prominent and wealthy politician.

"Put the story over in a big way regardless of facts, regardless of how foolish the story will read to those few in the small city who will know better, make the story readable to the majority who know little of the facts in the case." That seems to be the sort of a mind the big city editor has, also the correspondent who wires stories to the big city newspapers.

Get "good newsy stories" is a good policy but why encourage the reporters and correspondents to wild 'em up just to make the stories salable both to editors and readers?

An incident along this line was recently demonstrated in Western Pennsylvania. A young couple in McKeesport, Pa., Herbert Cooley and Alicia Tobin, were quietly married on July 22, at the home of the bride's parents. None but members of the two families witnessed the ceremony. The couple departed that evening for a honeymoon trip in a two-passenger Ford car. In less than a week's time the young bride decided that she had made a mistake in getting married, and while in the Lawrence Hotel at Erie, Pa., she wrote a letter to her husband telling him just why she was leaving him. There was much of a private and personal message yet she made it plain that without love there could be no permanent happiness, and that she was going away to seek employment, and asked that her parents be so notified and urged them not to worry about her.

Such has been the case with hundreds of ordinary couples and no great fuss was made of it.

But the big city newspapers from New York to Chicago played the story to death. Some of the dreamers wrote that she had dropped completely out of sight, some intimated that she had met with foul play, others that she vanished from the bridal suite without any knowledge of her husband, one newspaper in New York printed that she was amnesia victim, another that she had deserted her husband of five days to join a former sweetheart in Florida while on another day a newspaper story said she had been drowned in Conneaut Lake, Pa., and on another day she was positively identified as the young woman who attempted to buy carbolic acid at a drug store in Franklin, Pa.

But back in her home city the McKeesport Daily News handled the story entirely along different lines. Printing on its first page, on the same day the story first broke in the big city newspapers in a sensational item, the Daily News had a three line head on a two stick story giving all the facts. Of course the story lacked such features as detailing her wedding as one of the largest and most fashionable ever held in the city. It wasn't. It didn't say that her father was one of the most prominent and wealthy politicians of the city because its readers would have known better. It didn't say that she had vanished from the hotel and the young husband had become frantic waiting for her to return and that he feared foul play, because the young husband had shown the editor of the McKeesport paper the letter he had received in his hotel room five minutes after she had made up her mind to leave him. He was disturbed, of course, so were her parents. Both the father and the young husband were making an effort to locate her. They knew just why the young bride had deserted her husband. It wasn't a case of mysterious disappearance as the big city newspapers printed. It was a clean cut case of desertion as was printed in the couple's home city newspaper.

But the correspondents had a new dream each day, as to the cause of her disappearance. Out-of-town newspapers printed wild stories and because the McKeesport newspaper did not wild up the sensational features it caused many to think that the local newspaper was shielding somebody. That was not the case. The home newspaper had and printed the facts. There wasn't any more to it until she could be found or heard from.

On Aug. 18, two letters came to McKeesport from the young bride—one to her husband and the other to her father. Immediately both letters were placed in the hands of the editor of the McKeesport newspaper. Both were personal messages to the ones addressed. But there was big news in them, outside the matter of a private and personal nature. It was the fact that she did just what she said in her letter left for the young husband on the day she left him. It told where she had been all the time and that her mind had not changed one iota and that without love there could be no marriage and happiness, that she had not met with foul play and that there was no other man in the case, and she begged that the police and private detectives be called off and that she be let alone to live her own idea of life and that she was past 24 years of age and capable of making her own living.

These facts were printed in her home city newspaper twelve hours ahead of the big city newspapers who had been playing the case for over a week from every sensational angle possible.

Of course there was much other information in the letter she wrote to her husband and parents. But when shown to the editor of the McKeesport newspaper he treated the situation the same as any professional man should a client. He picked out of the letters what was news, what his readers were entitled to know, and printed it, but this time with a three column head because at this stage the other newspapers had printed so much piffle that when real news came and came to the local newspaper exclusively, it was a bigger story than when first printed.

"A small city newspaper editor occupies a position somewhat different from the big city newspaper editor. First of all he is known by perhaps 75 per cent of his readers. He is consulted by all sorts of people on all sorts of questions. He carries more confidences of the people of his community than any other person. Small city newspaper editors usually know more secrets and more people make a confidant of them on business, political, social and personal matters than any man in the community. And why not? Why shouldn't the people of a small city go to their editor with confidential matters? Lawyers and doctors have professional confidences with their clients, the editor's readers are his clients, and mean much more to him than the average client does to any other professional man. When the people of any community lose confidence in the editor of their newspaper that editor is done and the newspaper fails to serve as it should in a community. When other newspapers printed sensational 'stories' in connection with the Tobin-Cooley case the Daily News did not because we knew the facts. The principals in the case did like people will in most communities where they have the right sort of feeling toward the newspaper and its editor. They trust him. Have confidence in him. And a good newspaper editor will go the limit, even at times to allow his own newspaper to get 'scooped' before he will break the confidence of a fellow man."

NEWSPAPERS BOOSTING RADIO WHILE MAGAZINES GET AD BUDGETS

Dailies Urged to Regard Radio As Big Advertising Producer Rather Than News Competitor—Now $400,000,000 Industry

By H. S. WOODMAN

A PROMINENT radio manufacturer asked recently, "What's the matter with newspapers and radio? Are they afraid of it?"

The answer is not a direct affirmative, but it might be said that in general the question of the radio as a competitor of the newspaper has been given more attention than the question of radio as a new and liberal producer of newspaper advertising. There are many outstanding exceptions, of course.

Many publishers have long since recognized that in radio a new baby has been born to newspapers which promises to become one of the greatest producers of advertising since automobiles. The foundling is on the very doorstep waiting to be taken in. Some are already nursing it well.

Let us examine the vital statistics of this "baby."

Latest available figures show that in the United States there are today:

2,954 radio manufacturers; 2,690 distributors and jobbers; 300 manufacturers' agents; 32 exporters; 21 importers; 20,060 retail dealers.

There are 1,456 dealers in Illinois, 1,000 in California, 1,822 in Pennsylvania, 965 in Massachusetts, and 1,272 in New York City alone.

An unconfirmed report has it that there are over 3,000 dealers in New York City.

It is said by eminent authority that more than 200,000 people derive their living from radio.

Babson estimates that seventy-five cents out of every dollar spent on musical instruments goes into radio. It is believed that in 1924 $400,000,000 will be spent on radio equipment. Secretary Hoover has further stated that the radio is one of the greatest of human developments and that within a few years at most every American home except the very poorist will have some form of radio receiver.

Now consider the marketing of over four hundred millions of dollars' worth of equipment. Advertising will be the greatest single force in this undertaking. What are the newspapers going to do about it?

The magagines are on the job. There are many new publications, both weekly and monthly, devoted solely to radio. There are many trade papers also. Then there are the general magazines many of which are soliciting the business vigorously.

What are the newspapers going to say about the selection this fall of a long list of general magazines for an account involving thousands of dollars when those magazines have done nothing to boost radio? What are they going to say about dumping an appropriation of $80,000 into practically one magazine? This very thing was done last year and there is a good chance of the performance being repeated.

It is true the magazines are on the job. And what are they doing? They are selling the advertiser on the theory that they cover your city, Mr. Newspaper Publisher, and they are getting away with it.

Newspapers and radio have a natural affinity for each other. This affinity is analogous to that which exists between newspapers and financial markets. No magazine has ever successfully entered the field of finance. That is not to say that there are not successful financial magazines. There are. But no magazine has ever entered financial markets and carried away the largest share of the money spent by financial houses in marketing their stocks and bonds or selling their services as brokers. Witness that one great newspaper carried 2,371,000 lines of financial advertising in 1923, representing $1,775,000. Witness that the magazine, sometimes spoken of as the greatest, does not carry a line of financial advertising. The reason is simple. News of financial markets is a day to day proposition. A weekly magazine is out of the running and a monthly is as useless as frictionless brakelining in the big things of finance.

Now the same element of news which makes the newspaper of primary importance in financial markets is found in radio. There are few businesses in which this is true. It is the daily radio programs which make it so. And there is where the newspaper takes the floor. "What's on the air tonight?" is the first thing a "fan" asks as he picks up his newspaper. The radio manufacturers know this. The dealers know it better still. The public knows it. There are some newspaper publishers who know it. One of the wise ones carried in a single issue last spring more than 30,000 lines of radio advertising. There are many which will carry a volume of business this fall. But my manufacturer friend who asked the opening question of this article believes that the great American press has not yet taken the radio "baby" in, and that is why so many of them are not "sold" on newspapers as primary advertising mediums.

Illinois has a wonderful balance in the proportion of its urban and rural population, in the wealth and variety of agriculture and manufacture.

Illinois is an extremely attractive state for advertisers. The tremendous circulation of the many newspapers in this state present a total number of buyers that should appeal to all national advertisers.

The people are here, money is here, and newspapers are here. All depends on your advertising message.

Our Own World of Letters

By JAMES MELVIN LEE

SEPTEMBER seems to be a journalism month so far as the magazines are concerned. Special articles relating to the newspaper press, for example, will be found in the World's Work, Scribner's, and the Century. Because of the amount of material published in the periodical press this month I shall have to publish my comments in installments.

THE cartoon entitled "He Wouldn't Advertise" in the Saturday Evening Post for August 23, ought to be given the "once-over" by every advertising man. It shows in a very picturesque way the man who made the best mousetrap and then waited for the world to make a beaten path to his door. The cobwebs over the door, the grass growing between the boards of his stoop, and the brambles blocking his path all tell an interesting story in a wordless editorial.

CARL DICKEY begins in the World's Work for September a series of articles "The Truth about the Newspapers." The opening one is entitled "Independence of the American Press," and from it I quote the following paragraph that the reader may know in Mr. Dickey's own words about the scope and purpose of the series:

> I do not mean to say that American journalism does not have its "rot spots," its corners where ideals are debauched, where influence is sold, where news is twisted and distorted, and where newspapers have no souls. In these articles I will describe some of these journals and editors whose misdeeds are so often cited as general indictments of all newspapers, good and bad alike. These "rot spots" are more likely to be found in the smaller cities and in states of smaller population, where varied industries have not yet been developed; though reprehensible sheets do exist in the larger cities, but without any large measure of patronage or influence.

In his comment about Mr. Hearst, Mr. Dickey refers to the series of questions recently asked that newspaper publisher by EDITOR & PUBLISHER. He sketches the Times under Mr. Ochs, pays a fine tribute to the late Frank I. Cobb of the New York World, quotes E. Lansing Ray, editor and publisher of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, criticizes the newspaper fashions found in Omaha, Neb., and, of course, comments about Frank A. Munsey.

I quote the following paragraph for the sake of comparison with what Herbert Bayard Swope said on the same subject in his address, "Journalism: An instrument of Civilization" at Hobart College:

> The power and influence of the press as a whole has not decreased. The press has merely changed its course and is now exerting its influence in a more calm, detached and impartial manner. It is trying less to force its own opinions and policies upon its readers than in the days of Greeley and the personal journalists, and is seeking more and more to mould a sounder public opinion by printing the news and views on both sides of political and governmental questions and then seeking to give its own interpretations.

AWAY back when Ike Russell was "cubbing" on the Salt Lake City Deseret News, in 1905, Senator Clark of Montana built a railroad from Salt Lake to Los Angeles and said he'd take the trail blazers of that route over the road for a free ride. Ike drew the assignment to find out who the trail blazers really were. Some arose out of about every mountain gulch in the Wasatch and Uintah ranges, and finding out proved a greater job than could be "mopped up" in one sitting.

A probe was started that lasted nearly 20 years when "Hidden Heroes of the Rockies" emerged as a tribute from Ike to the real pathfinders. All of them he had placed forty or more years back of all the claimants he had dealt with and his book is an effort to rescue the real pathfinders from an oblivion that began when the settlers came in covered wagons to take the places of those who knew no "Covered Wagon" and came with rifle alone, and subsisted off it for several decades while taming the Indian and making the country ready for the settler.

JOHN A. STEVENSON, vice-president of the Equitable Life Assurance Comany, in an article in the Nation's Business for September gives the editorial writer several leads which, if properly developed, would make good copy for the editorial page. But I mention this article by Mr. Stevenson chiefly for the purpose of quoting his remark that sometime ago there appeared a criticism of the American press which stated that "the average editor over-estimates the public information, but under-estimates its intelligence." I, for one, would like to know where this criticism first appeared.

NO JOB office is now directly affiliated with the Baltimore Sun. Years ago, like most newspapers, it did have one but the late Charles H. Grasty, just before his retirement as business manager of the Sun, sold it to J. W. Magers. The latter, when he left Philadelphia, sold it in turn to a company headed by Frederick W. Strow who is general manager. At the time of the first sale there was some question about the right to use the name of the Sun in connection with the job plant but it was finally retained.

I mention this fact because it was not the job office of the Sun, but the Sun Book and Job Printing Office, Inc., with no newspaper connection, that published in booklet form the poems of Henry Edward Warner about which I made a few comments some time ago in this department.

IN RESPONSE to an inquiry I would say that one of the best discussions of newspaper ethics is the address which J. St. Loe Strachey, editor of the London Spectator, delivered at the Pan-Anglican conference. It has been printed in pamphlet form under the title "The Ethics of Journalism."

E. O. DEAN was for something like 25 years a newspaper man in New York City. Ten of these years he spent on the staff of the Evening Post. He is now chief editorial writer on the Providence (R. I.) News. In a recent issue of that paper under the running head of "Random Remarks" he says some very pertinent things about how the Post began to weaken under Mr. Villard and was not braced up by Mr. Lamont, in spite of the money the latter put into the Post-hole.

At first glance it would seem that Mr. Dean writes with a picric pen, but the second reading shows an absence of personal animosity as the following quotation will prove:

> So Professor Edwin F. Gay, dean of the Harvard School of Business Administration, took charge. Personally, no more lovable and kindly and gentlemanly man ever lived than Dr. Gay, a very able man, too; he was simply out of his element. Right away old-timers in the "game" shook their heads. They saw the rocks looming on the horizon.
> The good doctor hired promoters, vice-presidents, assistants to executives, specialty men, syndicate heads, feature editors, magazine editors, art editors, literary editors, book reviewers and a lot of nondescripts whose ostensible duties nobody seemed to know anything about. The editorial rooms and business offices swarmed with "four-flushers" drawing high salaries.

I would not be quite fair to Mr. Dean unless I added that his "Random Remarks" mention other Manhattan newspapers, not only those now published but also those about to be started. The remarks about the Times and the World are especially illuminating. His story will find a place in many a newspaper scrapbook because of the frank way in which he has set forth his personal opinion about New York newspapers and newspaper men.

HOBART College at Geneva, New York, has just issued in official form the Phi Beta Kappa address "Journalism: An Instrument of Civilization" which Herbert Bayard Swope, executive editor of the New York World, delivered at that institution on Commencement Day. This pamphlet, which may be obtained gratis upon application, deserves a careful reading because of the able manner in which Mr. Swope has presented several new points of view on modern journalism.

Mr. Swope frankly confesses that there never has been a really satisfactory definition of news, but offers as a substitute this apothegm, "any statement possessing interest, importance, truth, and timeliness."

The paragraph to which I wish to direct special attention is that in which Mr. Swope answers so clearly and succintly the charge that the power of the press has waned in recent years. His comment is quoted in full below:

> When true to itself, Journalism is its own best justification. It is a commonplace to say that the power of the press has waned. The statement is erroneous. The reverse is true. The power of the press is greater than ever before. The fallacy arises from a narrowed judgment point. Those affirming this thesis, measure with a political yardstick. They go back to other days when power was reckoned in accordance with the success achieved by special pleading for a particular editorial formula; when a rigid partisanship prevailed, in the so-called golden day of the editorial. There may be a lessening of the influence of the editorial page, measured in terms of direct political action, but this can be attributed to the difference in method as much as to any decay of influence. Today the first duty of an editorial is to stimulate thought, not to command slavish adhesion. If the expression of opinion succeeds in making a man think, more has been done for humanity than would be true if it had been able to compel a blind following.

FIRST edition copies of "Louder Please!" by Earnest Elmo Calkins are now being reserved by The Atlantic Monthly Press. The title doubtless comes from "The Technique of Being Deaf." Another charming sketch which is included in the volume, and which also appeared first in The Atlantic, is "A Small Boy's Reading." In a whimsical but pungent style Mr. Calkins traces his career from the time that he was an amateur printer in a small Middle Western town down to the present, when he is one of the foremost advertising experts in the country. Publication date has been set for September, 1924.

BRITISH COLONIES TOLD TO ADVERTISE

Higham Declares Rich Market Awaits Their Products in England—Australian Federation Adopts Advertising Tax Plan

By Herbert C. Ridout

(London Editor, Editor & Publisher)

London, Aug. 18.—It has been a matter of general comment in Great Britain since the opening of the British Empire Exhibition at Wembley that despite the many thousands of different commodities shown there as samples of overseas productions and manufactures, there is no evidence of whether and where they can be purchased at any place in England.

The point came to the front in the London Westminster Gazette, and Sir Charles Higham was invited to say why the Empire goods were not stocked by British shopkeepers. Sir Charles's reply was pertinent.

"They are simply dumped here. No one is told about them" he said. "If there is one line of goods which could be successfully exploited in Great Britain it is tinned fruits and fish, which are produced in excellent quality in all the Dominions. I believe Australia and Canada could sell all their goods if they were properly advertised."

"Why should not the overseas countries follow the examples of India. There the Government collects fivepence on every 100 pounds of tea sold, and this is earmarked by law for publicity purposes only. The Government collects the money and hands it back to a committee of tea-growers, to be spent. More than $500,000 a year is raised and spent in this way. This is why Great Britain and the world never forgets that tea is grown in India."

The Japanese tea-growers, he added are proposing to raise $5,000,000 in this way for the same purpose.

Subsequently an Australian official in London stated that the Australian National Federation of Fruit and Potato Trades Associations had adopted a scheme similar to that obtaining in India in regard to tea. A halfpenny a case is charged to each importer to cover the cost of advertising the products, with excellent results.

NEWSPRINT PRODUCTION HEAVY

Canadian 1924 Export Figures Well Above 1923

July exports of newsprint paper from Canada, according to bulletin of Canadian Pulp and Paper Association, amounted to 105,133 tons valued at $7,863,563, as against 92,959 tons valued at $7,045,653 in July, 1923. Value of all paper exported was $8,614,350, against $7,695,670. On other hand exports of pulp dropped from 83,924 to 52,232 tons and in value from $4,371,141 to $2,751,091.

For the first 7 months of the year exports of newsprint amounted to 710,418 tons valued at $53,528,417, as compared with 643,724 tons valued at $48,471,271 for same months of 1923. Value of all paper exported was $58,465,630, against $53,190,231. Pulp exports totaled 407,297 tons valued at $22,022,817, as compared with 480,157 tons valued at $26,435,367 in 1923.

Daily Using Sky Advertising

Through the enterprise of the Toronto Daily Star, visitors to the Canadian National Exhibition, which opened on August 23, are being given a demonstration of sky-writing by aeroplane, this being the first time for this stunt to be performed in Canada. The words Daily Star are being used.

Employes Honor Publisher's Son

Employes of the Scranton (Pa.) Times recently tendered a dinner in honor of William R. Lynett, son of the owner of the Times, whose appointment as assistant to the publisher went into effect several weeks ago. Mr. Lynett has been connected with the news department of the Times for a number of years and at the last session of Congress was Times' correspondent in Washington. It was decided at the dinner to hold annual outings for the Times "family."

daily newspapers go into the homes of West Virginia, and are read from the first page to the last.

West Virginians understand what an advertiser is trying to tell them about his product, because they believe in their daily newspapers, and if you get the facts before them, it is pretty close to making sales.

Minerals, in which this state ranks second, timber reserves, natural gas, petroleum, water power, a rich soil and excellent transportation facilities reveal the fact that West Virginia compares favorably with any locality in the United States in wealth, purchasing power and resources.

Manufacturers,—put your goods in these cities—put your advertising in these daily newspapers.

Through the columns of these publications you are able to create immediate demand for your merchandise.

BUSINESS TICKLER

LABOR DAY—and then good-bye business slump. Chase it.

Get your local merchants working on special sales covering low-priced goods. That will crowd the store aisles and there's nothing like a bargain crush to make people untie the wallet.

Pound the coalmen. If people's bins are empty advertising had better fill them now, for cold weather is going to start early.

How about storm-doors, weather strips, oil, gas, and coal heaters, steam-heating plants?

And the youngsters are going to play lots of football after a week or two.

ONE newspaper induced several local beauty parlors to share the cost of a general campaign of educating the public to greater use of beauty shops. The campaign ran six months, using a quarter page once each week.—Bert A. Teeters, Springfield (O.) News.

The Long Beach (Cal.) Press recently inaugurated a "Long Beach Merchants' Combined August Clearance Sale." A separate section containing nothing but store advertisements was published in connection with the regular issue. On the first page of the special section were listed all of the merchants whose ads were on the inside together with special mention of certain bargains offered by each advertiser. The regular advertisements did not appear in this special section unless the stores were in the group participating in the Combined August Clearance. Additional advertising to the extent of fifteen full pages was added by this innovation.—H. J. Ashe, Long Beach, Cal.

Hooking up advertising with news stories could be promoted more extensively with good profit. A southern Indiana newspaper carried a story of a Saturday night robbery in which a safe was stolen. The next day the story was lifted and made a part of an ad carried by a bank, which keeps open on Saturday nights to accommodate the merchants of the city. The story of the Lorain, O., disaster was lifted and made a part of an insurance ad. Many stories can be used in this way.—Yandell C. Cline, Columbus (Ind.) Republican.

During the farm auction sale season it is a good plan to feature some occasional boosts for the classified department. Many good sized classifieds can be brought in by some good copy built around the idea, "Not enough items for an auction—sell them at small expense through the classified columns."—W. Webb McCall, Mt. Pleasant (Mich.) Times.

"Four Wheel Brakes!" is the caption of a 100-inch advertisement run by the San Luis Obispo (Cal.) Herald and Telegram to bring up the advertising volume on a light day. The copy in the advertisement went on to tell of the safety of the four-wheel brakes, their value, etc. Underneath, in a double row of boxes appeared the names of San Luis Obispo automobile dealers that sold automobiles equipped with such brakes. The advertisement is sold on the co-operative basis, the cost being prorated among the dealers who advertise. The advertisement may be sold to appear on a day on which there is ordinarily less advertising than usual, and it has no effect on the dealers' regular schedules.—A. B., Berkeley, Cal.

Schools of all kinds are about to open their doors for the 1924-1925 term, making the time ripe for a concerted advertising effort among them. The Scranton (Pa.) Republican did this with good success, getting in space from the Y. M. C. A. evening school, music schools, business colleges, night schools, correspondence schools, music teachers and colleges. College and school news filled the pages which made up a comprehensive and profitable "School and College" section.—Robert L. Beard, Fort Wayne, Ind.

A Cincinnati department store recently devoted nearly three columns of a page display ad to "Classified. Clearances." This section contained about 75 classified ads which were made up in regular classified style with such heads as Wearable, For Homes, Yard Goods, Art Goods, Men's Wear, For Boys, Girl—Tots, Gloves, Neckwear, Miscellaneous, etc. Each ad was a bargain.—R. B. Miller.

Several enterprising daily newspapers recently have sponsored "Test Your Brakes" campaigns. The editors induce the local police to assign a squad of traffic officers to examine all automobile brakes during a certain week, obtaining the co-operation of the local safety council, motor club, chamber of commerce, etc. The advertising managers find no difficulty in securing a couple of additional full pages of paid ads. which are run by the local automotive jobbers, service stations, garages, brake experts, automobile dealers, etc., who call the attention of the motoring public to the fact that during the brake inspection campaign they will be glad to examine and adjust brakes free of charge. This advertising brings motorists, who, while having the control apparatus of their vehicles fixed up, usually purchase some replacement part or accessory for their cars.—Arnold A. Mowbray, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Where in keeping with advertising policy newspaper men find selling a bottom page streamer—one or two inch ad—an easy proposition. Several eight-column two-inch ads recently appeared in the Clinton (Ia.) Advertiser. They look good and appeal to the casual advertiser much better than a two-column 4- or 5-inch ad. —L. J. Jellison, Dubuque, Ia.

Druggists and stores handling toilet articles can increase their summer sales by advertising perfumes and elixirs prepared especially for hot weather use. Discriminating women make a change in the use of these articles as soon as the weather becomes warm. The practice can be spread by a bit of educational advertising. Have an advertising man call on the druggists to show them a way to boost their summer business.—A. C. Regli, Eau Claire, Wis.

Portland, Me., is the gateway to the many summer resorts of the State. A page stunt that we have put over with wonderful results for two years is the "Tourists' Handy Guide to Portland Shops." A map of the business center of the city was drawn and around the edge of this some 20 two-inch boxes were laid out. As each space was sold a line was drawn from the advertisement to the advertiser's position on the map. This page is run during the summer tourist season, and advertisers report very favorable tourist trade from their weekly insertions.—Tim Ward, Portland (Me.) Express.

LONDON TIMES PLACED BEYOND SPECULATION

Committee of 5 Named to Pass On Prospective Purchasers of Stock Eliminating Possibility of Buying for Personal Ambition

By Herbert C. Ridout
(London Editor, Editor & Publisher)

London, Aug. 18.—The London Times has always seemed to be something more than a mere newspaper. It is an institution, not simply of Britain, but of world history. At one period, at least, it seemed in danger of being commercialized in the popular sense, but the present proprietors, Major John Astor, M.P., and John Walters have gradually brought the paper back to its former independent greatness without sacrificing any of the true improvements effected by the former proprietary.

It is now announced that steps have been taken by which the famous newspaper shall be rendered, as far as human judgment can effect it, immune from speculative or other purchase or control. For some time the movement has been under consideration, and now a Committee has been established for the special purpose of safeguarding future transfers of the controlling shares in the Times. These shares, it should be explained, are those of The Times Holding Company, Ltd. and are all held by Major John Astor, M.P. and by John Walter, who together constitute the chief proprietors of the Times.

The Committee has no other responsibilities so far as the Times is concerned. It is not in any sense identified either with the management or with the editorial policy. The sole object underlying its appointment is to ensure, so far as is possible, that the ownership of the Times shall never be regarded as a mere matter of commerce to be transferred without regard to any other circumstance to the highest bidder, or fall, so far as can be foreseen, into unworthy hands.

With this object in view, it has been thought desirable that the members of the Committee should act ex-officio, that they should be precluded by their position from active party politics, and that they should represent various elements—judicial, academic, scientific and financial—in the national life. The following, therefore, have consented to serve—

The Lord Chief Justice of England.
The Warden of All Souls College, Oxford.
The President of the Royal Society.
The President of the Institute of Chartered Accountants.
The Governor of the Bank of England.

They cannot, of course, bind their successors; but in the event of any one or more of the future holders of their offices declining to act, or being incapable of acting, provision has been made for the appointment of members to the Committee in substitution for them.

The Committee will be constituted under the Articles of Association of The Times Holding Company Limited, and the following extract from the Articles to be adopted for this purpose defines the principles which are laid down for its guidance in the event of any projected sale of the Ordinary (that is, the controlling) shares:—

In coming to their decision whether any proposed transferee is a proper person to hold Ordinary shares of the company, the Committee shall have an absolute discretion and may give or withhold their approval on any ground whatever which they may think fit and proper, and without their being bound to give any reason therefor, it being the intention and an instruction to the Committee that inasmuch as the Company holds the absolute voting control in the Times Publishing Company, Limited, which owns the Times newspaper, the Committee, in coming to their decision, shall have regard to the importance of (a) maintaining the best traditions and political independence of the Times newspaper, and national rather than personal interests, and (b) eliminating as far as reasonably possible questions of personal ambition or personal profit.

EDITORS COMPLETE TOUR

Wisconsin Press Feted by Dailies During Annual Motor Trip

Three Badger State newspapers—the Milwaukee Journal, the Janesville Gazette and the Burlington Standard Democrat—banquetted members of the Wisconsin Press Association, on their fourth annual motor tour through Wisconsin, Aug. 23, 24 and 25.

The editors, starting from Milwaukee 166 strong in 44 automobiles, visited Mukwonago, East Troy, Elkhorn, Fort Atkinson, Janesville, Delavan, Whirewater, the Yerkes observatory at Williams Bay, Lake Geneva and Burlington. Upon their return to Milwaukee they visited the state fair, where the association had an exhibit and published a newspaper daily the week of the fair.

President John A. Kuypers of the De Pere Journal-Democrat and Secretary Louis Zimmerman were congratulated for arranging the largest and most successful tour.

Speakers at the dinners were the president and the secretary, Editor Stephen Bolles and Publisher H. H. Bliss of the Janesville Gazette, W. H. Bridgman of the Stanley Republican, Managing Editor Marvin H. Creager, Automobile Editor W. W. "Brownie" Rowland, William Cuddy and John R. Wolf of the Milwaukee Journal.

The event concluded with a housewarming party at the new $2,000,000 building of the Milwaukee Journal, which will be occupied during September.

HUNCHES

ONE DOLLAR WILL BE PAID FOR EACH "HUNCH" PUBLISHED

THE Cleveland Press has developed with great success a weekly school page. The stories and art are direct contributions from pupils. Authorship is featured and full credit given in "By-lines," etc. This is a big circulation builder and in towns and cities where high schools and grade schools have no weekly newspapers of their own should be especially good as a stimulator of both readers and news sources. For the amount of space used I believe this school feature attracts and holds more readers than any similar feature. Now is the time to start the feature—right with the opening of schools.—CELIA M. STRIEGEL, Cleveland, O.

Smokers are very sensitive about their likes and dislikes, and a nice little Sunday feature could be dug up, by talking over these foibles with the clerks of the leading cigar stores in your city. Quote some of the peculiarities and beliefs of your leading men, in their smoking habits. Incidentally, the business office could hook-up this page with a smoker's feature page of advertising.—EHU GHBERT, Chicago.

What roads in and out of your city are most frequented by the citizen off for a spin in his auto with his family; at what hours and on what days is traffic of these pleasure cars heaviest? By having a reporter investigate local conditions and give schedule of crowded and less crowded roads and hours, it will be possible to serve public by informing average man when he may expect to motor without getting into the thickest congestion—C. M. LITTLEJOHN, Washington, D. C.

Many papers now send copies to the larger cities of the country where the papers are offered for sale by "Get Papers from Your Old Home Town" stands. It would make an interesting story to tell what cities have copies of your paper on sale in this way and which of these cities has the greatest sale of your papers regularly.—FRANK H. WILLIAMS, Fort Wayne, Ind.

"Helping the Blind to Help Themselves" was the title of a recent Fort Wayne News-Sentinel magazine section feature, illustrated with photos of the blind weaving rugs, making baskets, chair bottoms, etc. Scarcely a city but what has an organization aiding the blind and a story of how the sightless overcome their handicap and make a living in spite of it is interesting.—ROBERT L. BEARD, Fort Wayne (Ind.) News-Sentinel.

Did you ever print a story telling of the number of dwellings, stores and business houses in your city? It gives a good chance for a booster article for your community. Emphasize the increase over last year, 5 and 10 years ago. Figures are interesting to many persons and here is a chance to deal in figures of a community interest. Public records will give the necessary information.—A. C. REGLI, Eau Claire, Wis.

Many papers carry news from schools, but few have, I venture to say, gone into it on the scale we have for the past two years. Circulating in a rural community, we are always on the lookout for the things which interest our farmer readers. The school news is one department in which their interest never lags. There are about one hundred rural schools in our territory, and we have found it good business to furnish each teacher with correspondence materials and invite her to send in a report for each month. These reports give attendance records, scholarship awards, accounts of special programs, etc., and mention many pupils' names. Reports of many neighborhood happenings and social events also come in through this channel. The schools vary some in respect to the date of their report, so our school department is fairly well divided through the various issues. It works out as a sure fire feature for rural readers.—W. WEBB MCCALL, Mt. Pleasant (Mich.) Times.

WHAT OUR READERS SAY

Is It Legitimate?

MCALESTER, Okla., August 13, 1924.

TO EDITOR & PUBLISHER:—Some 45 years ago the Detroit Commercial Advertiser built up a (then) big subscription list through use of a lottery plan, giving many thousands of dollars in cash prizes to its readers each year. The capital prize was $10,000 and fully $50,000 was supposed to be distributed annually. Toward the close of its career the Commercial Advertiser was compelled to hold its drawings on board a steamboat in the middle of the Detroit river, between the U. S. and Canada. When finally the postoffice department compelled abandonment of the lottery feature, the circulation dropped almost immediately to a negligible point.

Another unique subscription-getting plan which originates in Detroit is that of the Dearborn Independent. Each Ford agency is allotted a stated number of subscriptions per month, depending upon the standing of the agency, we suppose. In your issue of Aug. 2, mention is made of 700,000 or more circulation, "the bulk of which was obtained by Ford agents on a liberal commission." And as the publishers are equipped to turn out 1,000,000 copies per week, the "saturation point" of which we hear so much of late with regard to automobile selling, must not have been reached.

The plan is unique. But the writer feels skeptical about those commissions earned. Are they actually EARNED, or is this assessment allowed simply as an easy way of "getting by" an unpleasant situation, the agency being sufficiently profitable to "stand the gaff"? No agency of this kind would voluntarily mess with solicitation of subscriptions to a monthly or weekly periodical—that stands to reason. It is "out of their line." And I happen to know of a number of subscriptions for which not one penny was paid by "ye subscriber."

No doubt this will pass the postoffice department unless someone makes strenuous objection. But is it any more legitimate than the voting contest plan, and some others?

Yours truly,
OLD TIMER.

AD RESOLUTION ADOPTED

Public Utilities Association Outlines Its Advertising Duty

The Public Utilities Advertising Association this week made public a resolution recently adopted which is to the effect that advertising is not only a wise policy on the part of public utilities but is actually a duty to both customers and stock holders.

The resolution follows:

"1. That it is as important to advertise the services which public utilities can render to the community as it is to advertise the goods of firms which have no monopoly rights of supply;

"2. That goodwill, based upon equitable policy and 'service-first' principles, is essential to the permanent prosperity and persistent progress of public utility undertakings;

"3. That advertising is essential to the establishment and maintenance of such goodwill;

"4 That fully educated, efficient salesmen are equally essential; and

"5. That the possession of a monopoly, whether by a company or a municipality, imposes on its administrators the duty of a policy of progressive business methods, in the interests of consumers as well as of stockholders."

The SOUTH
WANTS TO BUY AS WELL AS SELL

The South wants to buy because she has big, permanent resources that make her buying capacity far up in the billions.

The South's agricultural production exceeded six billon dollars in 1923 or over 37 per cent of the country's total, or 35 per cent of the farm acreage of the country.

The mineral production of the South exceeded one billion four hundred million dollars for the same year.

On top of all this her manufactured products totaled more than six billion eight hundred million dollars.

It is estimated that the Southern States have nearly 40 per cent of the wooded area and 23 per cent of the saw timber of the United States—no mean percentage when the rapidity of lumber manufacturing is considered.

The exports from the South are rapidly increasing and last year reached the stupendous sum of one billion four hundred million dollars.

Her production in fishing, oystering and other activities runs up into big buying figures.

Added to this, with bank deposits of more than six and a half billion dollars, is the purchasing power of these various articles showing what per cent of the nation's production they represent.

A Kansas City Phenomenon

MORE than three years ago, Walter S. Dickey bought the Kansas City Journal with a circulation daily of 31,000 and Sunday 29,000, and within a short time thereafter acquired the Kansas City Post.

The Consolidated Press Association service was immediately installed and has been an integral part of the two newspapers ever since. Compare the figures today:

The Journal in the morning has a circulation today of 157,429, and the Post, 170,169 in the afternoon. On Sundays, The Journal-Post has 186,938. This truly represents a phenomenal growth. The advertising lineage has also increased manyfold.

"There is no question," writes E. O. Syman, General Business Manager of the Kansas City Journal-Post, "but that the Consolidated Press Association service is one of the contributing factors to our growth in circulation and prestige in Kansas City and the surrounding territory."

"The Chicago Territory"—as is

The population of the five states nearest Chicago, sometimes called "the Chicago territory"—Illinois, Wisconsin, Indiana, Michigan and Iowa—is more than five times that of Chicago's "40-mile radius."

To "cover" these five states as The Daily News covers the "40-mile radius"—in which 94% of its circulation is concentrated—would require a circulation of about five times The Daily News' circulation of approximately 400,000, or 2,000,000.

To "dominate" this area in an advertising sense would require at all circulation points an unqualified reader interest in the paper's local news, delayed general news, and advertising contents that are largely local. The advertiser would be required to effect throughout this territory the same "control" over his campaign, in advertising and sales tie-up, that he does in Chicago and its suburbs.

The circulation and productive reader interest of The Chicago Daily News is concentrated 94% in Chicago and its suburbs. This rich, concentrated market The Daily News serves and in it produces greater results for advertisers than does any other Chicago daily newspaper.

There Are Two Ways of Getting Business

One is to scatter your efforts over a large territory only hitting the high spots, the other is to concentrate in a smaller and given territory. The intensive, careful cultivation of a smaller territory—a territory like—where you can get plenty of team work from your local merchants and your daily newspapers—and you will get what you want—for what you want is business in the way of orders.

Dotted closely over the state of Pennsylvania are thriving cities and towns — each one potentially a profitable distributing point for your product—each a market center for a hustling community with railroads and trolley lines "spider webbing" in every direction.

Density of population and diversity of needs make Pennsylvania an ideal market for the alert advertiser.

These newspapers named below are leaders in their respective fields and present an admirable list to cover this state intensively.

"Little Nemo In Slumberland"

By WINSOR McCAY

IS A SATISFYING SUNDAY COMIC

McCay's page embodies all the fine essentials necessary to a newspaper feature. It has originality, beauty, and humor of a sort that cannot be duplicated.

It provides the paper buying it with an exclusive feature that has compelling circulation value.

It attracts the child and interests the parent. It is fine in motif and exquisite in draftsmanship.

Mr. McCay's list—the page was released for publication beginning August 3—includes many of America's most successful papers.

WINSOR McCAY
Creator of Little Nemo

"THE arresting quality of Mr. McCay's work is the imaginative knack, although it should be called something more than that, for it is the result of the creative spirit of the real artist. This is the trait that distinguishes the work of Mr. McCay from that of so many other persons in the so-called comics.

It is comic, but is something more than comic, because it appeals to that order of the imagination which is so evident in the work of Lord Dunsany.

Lord Dunsany builds dream cities and populates them with the sort of characters who dwell in dreams.

Winsor McCay, in company with Maxfield Parrish, has something of this same faculty; he leads one into a kind of fairyland, where the beautiful and the mirthful are forever struggling for supremacy. His comedy is the comedy of dreams."

Rockefeller Money Backs Scientific Probe of News Methods and Sources

Widely-Representative Commission Already at Work, and Large Appropriation Is Advanced for Exhaustive Study of Newspapers and Influences That May Affect Them—Expose of Propaganda Inevitable—Opportunity for American Newspaper Associations

By WILLIAM T. ELLIS

Copyright, 1924, by Editor & Publisher

BACKED by four national scientific associations of highest standing, and financed by one of the great philanthropic foundations, a comprehensive survey of news sources, news gathering, propaganda, and, inevitably, of the entire news aspect of the American newspapers is now in the early stages of its operation.

Approximately two years will be consumed in the general investigation, but certain aspects of it may continue for a much longer period. It is even contemplated that specific universities may be subsidized to continue special studies in the fields which will be opened; and it is the hope of the university men engaged in the investigation that textbooks upon news and newspapers will result from the studies made.

The foregoing two paragraphs outline the greatest story affecting the newspapers of America that has "broken" in a generation. Consolidation and changes of ownership of individual papers are relatively unimportant alongside of this first scientific and exhaustive survey of the nature of news and the purity of its sources and channels as it is purveyed to the public. The whole vexed question of propaganda will come under full review. The integrity of American journalism will be relentlessly investigated.

Naturally, this development calls for the attention of all makers of newspapers; and for the active co-operation of organized journalism.

No graver consideration affects American journalism today than the present widespread and oft-expressed distrust of the disinterestedness and accuracy of its news. Protest as they may, and riddle as they do such accusations as come out into the open, the newspapers are under suspicion. All other issues that confront the press are subordinate to this. For when public confidence goes, all goes.

Many articles and books have been written in criticism of the fairness and freedom of the newspapers. Most of them have been uninformed or prejudiced. Now the subject has been brought out into the open, in a manner that will eventually command the attention and respect of all newspaper men, and of the whole general public.

Little as they may be at first disposed to like it, the press, especially in its foreign news services, is being made the subject of a searching and scientific study, such as the hookworm and the yellow-fever and other pestilences have undergone. The odium of this experience is rather lifted by the recollection that the churches, the educational system of the nation, and other great professions and institutions have been looked into in somewhat the same fashion by relentless scientists.

The first steps toward this investigation were taken nearly two years ago, at the meeting of the American Sociological Society. Subsequently, for the sake of scientific authoritativeness and also for adequate financial support, it was put on the broader foundation of the Social Science Research Council, which is the official agent of the American Economic Association, the American Political Science Association, the American Statistical Association, and the American Sociological Society.

WALTER ROGERS

Mr. Rogers, well known to newspaper men, is chairman of the committee investigating the press.

The scientific head of the work is Dr. Herbert A. Miller of Ohio State University.

The committee has already received $25,000 and has a budget of $170,000.

Long preliminaries were conducted by the committee on international relations of the American Sociological Society, comprising Roscoe Pound, of the Harvard Law School; Robert E. Park, of the University of Chicago; Jerome Davis, of Yale University; Jane Addams, of Hull House, and Herbert Adolphus Miller, of the Ohio State University, the chairman.

In attempting to secure financial support, it was found that the word "sociological" appeared to some eyes to wear a tinge of pinkness, if not of redness. Conservative custodians of funds dedicated to the public welfare are in no mood nowadays to support radical undertakings. So the sponsors of the plan, assured of their own disinterestedness, sought a broader foundation for their project, which would have to carry public confidence in its utter fairness if it was to amount to anything worth while.

An appropriate agency for doing this new task was already at hand in the Social Science Research Council of the combined American Economic, Political Science and Statistical associations, along with the Sociological Society. After due consideration the Council agreed to undertake the investigation.

So high is the prestige of this group of scientists and investigators that the Laura Spellman Rockefeller Memorial Foundation straightway put up $2500 for the expenses of a preliminary conference on the subject. A meeting was held in May to consider the scope of the project and to draw up a budget.

As officially defined at this conference, the plan is to make "a thoroughly scientific and objective investigation of the instrumentalities involved in the world-wide collection and dissemination of current news and opinion of international concern, and of the underlying and related problems of the formation of expression and significance of attitudes on international affairs."

Put into newspaper English this means that these trained investigators intend to find out what, if anything, is wrong with the news, especially foreign news, printed by the newspapers.

The men directing the present research add to this official definition the explicit declaration that the press associations are to be studied, and the mechanism of news-collection and transmission, as conditioned by cable, radio and film. They accept the inevitability of a survey of the whole newspaper field. It is already apparent to them, they say, that the study of "attitudes" (which is somewhat of a euphemism for the whole subject of possible subsidization and propaganda) is perhaps the most difficult aspect of their undertaking.

Scientific men possess ability and courage, but they are notoriously lacking in money. Such a staggering task as the full investigation of the news field requires large financial resources, and they know it. So the budget was fixed at $170,000. Aside from the preliminary expense fund of $2500, the work has already had a grant of $25,000. The balance of the budget will be forthcoming as the work proceeds.

In direct charge of the investigation is Dr. Herbert Adolphus Miller of the Ohio State University, who won especial distinction during the war by his work in consolidating on the side of the Allies the small nations of middle Europe. The chairman is Walter Rogers, of the United States Bureau of Communications, formerly of the Washington Herald.

Already the committee has gone far enough to perceive the paramount importance of the investigation. They understand that it must be so objective that it will carry conviction to the general public. Their activities will enter the troubled field of Old-World animosities and suspicions, and it will require all their scientific prestige to carry off a criticism of any nation or special group. If an individual correspondent or paper declares today, for example, that Soviet Russia still operates the "cheka," with its blood-thirsty methods, in the Caucasus, he is straightway called a liar and a hireling of the reactionaries and monarchists by all supporters of Bolshevism. Likewise, if one man dare write about the Greek or Armenian propaganda, he is immediately labelled as a pro-Turkish agent; if he criticizes the Turks, he is on the Greek or Armenian pay-roll.

Not so with this commission. Its findings cannot be waved aside as partisan. The greatest nations will be subject to its conclusions, for these would have the support of public opinion. Should the commission write openly the tales that are told in the inner circles of the informed concerning the abuse of cable control by governments, this evil would have to come to a speedy end.

In like manner, if the operations of various well-intentioned but one-ideaed international societies which are so prolific in propaganda were bared to the public gaze there would ensue an end of their support, and of their publicity. Casualties in the press-agent profession would be numerous following the report of this committee's findings.

First to welcome the entrance of the savants into this field are the newspapers themselves, in the confidence that such a searching examination of the whole case of world news as has been undertaken will result in a vindication of the American reporter, the American news-gather-

Horde of Reporters and Camera Men Play Hide and Seek on Berengaria's Decks to Get Scrambled Interview—Special Tug for Writers

MORE than 100 came; 20 saw; and 4 interviewed.

Such was the meeting of the American press with His Royal Highness, the Prince of Wales, when he arrived in this country on the Berengaria, Friday, Aug. 29.

The actual interview was the silliest newspaper performance the writer ever witnessed.

But it was not entirely the fault of the news men. A Prince has something to say about how he shall be interviewed, even when the interviewers represent the enterprising American press.

Almost smothered behind a human wall of milling press representatives on cramped deck space, David Windsor, heir to the British throne, answered in double pianissimo, questions asked him in dulcet tones by Harry Cunningham, New York Evening World; James Duffy, New York Telegram; John Stuart, New York Sun, and Grace Robinson, New York Daily News.

"Have you a written statement?" was one question.

A typewritten slip was passed to the news men. The Prince had said he was "glad to be back in the United States." The interview was ended.

Camera men who had lugged heavy paraphernalia under a hot sun, had no opportunity for snaps.

One newspaper woman who had come all the way from Toronto, Ont., to "interview the Prince," heard him say "yes" in answering a question which she did not catch.

One hundred newspaper men had only the glint of golden princely hair on which to base a story.

The Prince of Wales, long known as "His Royal Shyness," had outwitted the "outposts of American journalism"—the newspaper men who had gone down the bay to meet him at Quarantine.

Old-timers among the New York ship news men said the number of news writers assigned to cover the Royal arrival established a record for recent months at least. A few argued that General Foch drew a bigger crowd.

John Regan, secretary for the New York Ship News Reporters Association, is authority for the statement that more accredited newspaper men were sent down the bay to meet the Prince than for any other celebrity in his memory.

However this matter is settled it would be hard to outrival this assignment for pleasure, rush, suspense and disappointment, qualities common to many newspaper stories.

Pleasure and suspense began on board the Howard C. Moore, a tug chartered by the Cunard Line to carry newspaper men and women down the bay to meet the Berengaria and its distinguished passenger.

A pleasant harbor boat ride appeared in prospect. It was 12 noon when the clan gathered. Cool breezes from across the North River made Pier 56, where the tug was moored, a much more liveable place than a hot sun promised.

Veterans of the ship news beat began telling of the "famous celebrities" they had met and talked with. Harmonicas were whipped from hip pockets.

Then suspense climbed aboard. Cunard officials notified the newspaper men that they had wirelessed the Prince asking for a meeting with the press, and that the message had been ignored. The tug would not sail.

The reporters, thereupon, decided to elect a committee of 3 to go to Sir Ashley Sparkes of the Cunard Line and ask him to see that at least they had the trip down the bay and chance possible permission to go on board the Berengaria and meet the Prince.

On the tug were 70 newspaper men and photographers and 4 women. Another group was to take the regular route to Quarantine on a U. S. Revenue Cutter.

One newspaper man, F. B. Owen, had come all the way from Montreal to cover the arrival. He is a member of the staff of the Montreal Gazette. Two had journeyed from Toronto, Ont., F. G. Griffin, Toronto Star, and Miss Lucy Doyle, Toronto Telegram, and also honorary president of the Canadian Women's Press Club. Many with Park Row and wider newspaper reputations were there, including Fred B. Edwards of the New York Herald-Tribune; Dudley Nichols, of the New York Evening Post; Sir Horace McArdle, Dublin Times; O. H. P. Garrett, of the New York World; John K. Winkler, of the New York American; Frank Getty, of the United Press, and Lloyd Lehrbras, of the International News Service, just returned to this country from 2 years spent in China for that press association, where he was on the train held up by Chinese bandits.

It looked for a while as though they had drawn merely a sunburn assignment.

The committee to plead with Sir Ashley was finally elected consisting of Cunningham of the Evening World, Regan of the City News Association, and Jack Price, a World photographer, representing the camera men. Within an hour they returned with the word that the tug would sail, taking a chance on obtaining royal favor after the yellow flag was lowered at Quarantine.

The Howard C. Moore moved on down the bay.

Folded bits of copy paper first came from the newspaper men's pockets when the funnels of the Berengaria broke the haze off Sandy Hook. Four airplanes were circling over the giant Cunarder. The news men noted the exact hour and minutes of her first appearance.

The exact time when the anchor clanked down into the water was also written down for posterity. The best eyes among the trained observers soon picked out the Prince leaning against the rail of the topmost deck.

When the newspaper men clambered by ladder up the Berengaria's sides at Quarantine, word was passed that the Prince would be waiting for them on the topmost deck. In single file, a formation necessitated by the means of embarkation, the writers and camera men rushed aloft 3 steps at a time, emerging at last in the sunlight.

Then commenced a game of hide-and-seek on the Berengaria's A deck, among the funnels, ventilators and lifeboats with the royal vacationist hiding and the representatives of the American public seeking.

Finally all the press representatives gathered somehow on C deck, a small shaded space, where photography was absolutely impossible. There was brief handclapping and a slight golden haired, embarassed, young man suddenly appeared —the Prince.

"Photographers stand back!" someone yelled.

Then, with pencils and paper ready, the writers mobbed the Prince, who shook hands with the first four to reach his side.

The rest of the interview was a blank for the majority of those who had given up a day to meet the aggressive vacationist.

Those nearest could hear the murmured questions of the lucky few and the almost whispered response of His Royal Highness.

Five minutes was to be the time allowed the press before the Prince would leave the Berengaria for the yacht Black Watch and the trip to Long Island. Many of these minutes were wasted.

"Are you going to stay in this country long?" was one unnecessary query.

"Are you going straight to your ranch at Calgary?"

"Are you going to marry an American girl?" trilled Miss Robinson of the Daily News, who had elbowed her way up to the front rank.

"Thank you very much." And that was all.

"What about pictures?" stammered a luckless camera man. There were few taken on the Berengaria.

Enterprise took care that the Prince did not escape the photographic barrage entirely. The United News Pictures had chartered a launch, and from its bobbing deck managed to take some pictures of H. R. H. as he stood on the deck of the Black Watch.

So ended America's opportunity of interviewing the Prince on his arrival. During His Highness' stay at Syosset, Long Island, Major Oscar Solbert, U. S. A., furnished the daily press contact, notifying the newspaper men of the Princely schedule. Because of the large number of newspaper men assigned to cover the Prince, the Western Union Telegraph Company announced early this week that it had opened press headquarters in the Long Island Railroad station at Syosset and installed special wires.

Those who met the Prince on the Berengaria, many of whom were assigned to cover his entire stay in this country, were:

MASON DISCUSSES WHAT "GETS" THE PUBLIC

Distinguished Managing Editor New York Herald Tribune Offers Six Suggestions for Successful Newspapering—Says Formula Impossible—Great Paper Must Have Distinct Personality

By JULIAN MASON

THE distinguished managing editor of the "New York Herald Tribune" herewith essays to discuss that perplexing riddle: "What does the public want?" He approaches the question with the deference of long practical experience. Graduated from Yale, Class of 1898, he entered business first as a wholesale grocer in Chicago. H. H. Kohlsaat gave him his first newspaper job on the "Chicago Herald" in 1899 "chasing small stories." Next he went to the "Chicago Tribune." In 1905 he changed to the "Chicago Evening Post." On this newspaper he held every job in the editorial department, being appointed head editorial writer in 1911 and in 1916 managing editor. He joined the New York newspaper fraternity in March, 1922.

I DON'T know what gets the public, but I do know what gets me, and that is that anyone should believe that I should know what gets the public, or that if I did, I would be foolish enough to divulge it.

But I must make the attempt. Therefore, I should say, speaking for my own profession, that to make a newspaper, simply to "get" the public—which is, as everyone knows, an ignoble object, far apart from the higher purposes of journalism—I would make a newspaper that is a distinct person and endow it with all the qualities that make a person attractive and interesting.

I would give it first of all character—not only the kind of character that comes from honest service to the public, but also the free development of its own individuality. Do not be afraid that this will not develop in a way that is far above and distinct from owner, publisher, or editor. Give it a chance and the paper itself reaches over your shoulders at night, takes your hand and says this story should go there on the front page.

Horace Greeley recognized this separate and sentient entity. When Greeley was away one time, President Johnson demanded the resignation of the great Stanton and the Tribune swung full force behind the demand for impeachment. Greeley did not believe in impeachment, because it might martyrize Johnson; but, because the Tribune had spoken, he held unflinchingly by its course. He used to say that he never picked up his Tribune in the morning without a thrill of excitement over what "the paper itself" may have done to him after he had made it up and gone home at 11 o'clock.

Another story to show you the feeling of helplessness which an editor experiences over a product which he may have planned out most carefully from beginning to end in all detail.

There was a copy reader on the old Chicago Record-Herald who rejoiced in the appropriate name of "Butch" White. One morning at 2 o'clock a reporter came rushing into the city room and said:

"Oh, Mr. White, I've got a very strange suicide story. A man was riding across the Clark street bridge in a trolley car reading a newspaper. He suddenly threw the newspaper on the floor, rushed out of the car, jumped over the bridge rail, and was drowned in the river below."

"Probably a managing editor looking at the first edition of his paper," said Mr. White.

I would give this paper of ours a wise universality. The New York Evening Sun, under the managing editorship of the brilliant young Mr. Arthur Brisbane, once gave New York the smartest, the most sophisticated, the wittiest paper that it has perhaps ever known. Yet Mr. Laffan and Mr. Brisbane disagreed, because Mr. Laffan said and said truly, I think:

Julian S. Mason—"We are dealers in emotions."

"If we were running the Fifth Avenue Hotel and offered our guests a menu of only caviar and cabbage, you'd be surprised at the number who would order cabbage."

But the paper must have wit, probably the most dangerous of all characteristics, but, rightly used, the most effective. I mean wit that will take a present day happening and instantly throw it into a form that will give it background, understanding and ironic truth.

We had a delightful instance of this the other day, when lunching with a witty editor from the West. Before luncheon we were talking of the inevitable Eighteenth Amendment and the disregard of law. Just then, I regret to say, cocktails were brought in. He took the glass, held it up and instantly gave the toast:

"Here's to crime and Constitution, one and inseparable, now and forever!"

To get the public, I would give the paper enterprise—not only the enterprise that adapts itself to any situation instantly, but also the fundamental journalistic enterprise of digging, digging, digging for facts.

General Grant on his death bed handed to his physician a memorandum of his last wishes, saying: "Doctor, don't tell this to another living person. If you do, the newspapers will get it."

The paper, too, must be close to the well-springs of human feeling and experience, even to human superstitions. Another American newspaper man and I went to a luncheon party at the house of Lord Northcliffe 3 years ago. We were about to sit down, when we realized that there were 13 at the table and that Northcliffe was standing erect at its head.

"You know, your Lordship, that in America some people would be foolish enough not to sit down 13 at table," my American companion said, wishing to make the situation less strained.

"Foolish enough?" said Northcliffe. "Foolish enough? You can only say that because you come from a younger civilization. In England we know what happened to Sir Harry Furness, of Punch, after he started a Thirteen Club; we know what happened to Harry Lord; we know because we are an older civilization, that it is only the old beliefs handed down from generation to generation that are altogether true and to be accepted. I shall not sit down, thirteen at table.

And he didn't.

And when I had endowed a newspaper upon the formulæ I have just sketched, I should by no means be sure that it might get the public. Because, in film or play, or newspaper, we are dealing not with reason or logic alone, but with those strange indefinable currents of human life which we class under the word emotion. And emotion cannot be put into rules or formulæ.

Probably it is for that reason that newspaper success has never been formulated in a way to permit it to become an exact science. It is an ordinary fact, for instance, that no Bible of newspapering, so to speak—no great book, either technical or autobiographical, has been written, which gives to editors a hint as to the safe and standard way in which to lay their course.

Charles A. Dana said that he knew no secret formula for success—that the best rule of thumb he could recommend for creating a successful newspaper was to get into it able men and let them have their head.

Such a definition, I fear, leaves you exactly at the starting point. Nevertheless, I can only declare my belief that if you would make a newspaper in the form of the most wise, the most fair, the most enterprising, the most charming attractive and interesting person you can imagine, you might have at least a gambler's chance of "getting the public."

New Daily Enlarges Staff

Additions to the staff of the Hendersonville (N. C.) Daily Times, which recently became a daily under the editorship of John Temple, Graves, were announced this week. They are: Henry Atkin, formerly Ashville Citizen, news editor; Henry Loop, circulation manager; W. S. Scott, formerly Winston-Salem Journal, mechanical foreman; Richard H. Mills, late of the Messengale Advertising Agency, Atlanta, Ga., advertising manager. John Ewbank, former owner, is in charge of the job printing plant, and will remain in this capacity until a permanent manager is obtained.

WHAT "GETS" THE PUBLIC?

JULIAN STARKWEATHER MASON offers the following rules for building circulation and maintaining reader interest:

1.—A newspaper first must have character—character that comes not only from honest service to the public, but also from the free development of its own individuality.

2.—It must have a wise universality.

3.—It must have wit, probably the most dangerous of all characteristics, but rightly used, the most effective.

4.—It must have not only the enterprise that adapts itself to any situation instantly, but also the fundamental journalistic enterprise of digging, digging, for facts.

5.—A newspaper must be close to the well-springs of human feeling and experience, even to human superstitions.

6.—In the words of Charles A. Dana the best rule of thumb is to get able men and let them have their head.

JACK LAIT MADE M. E. OF N. Y. AMERICAN

Versatile Newspaper Man, Short Story and Play Author Assumes High Executive Position — Victor Watson Assistant Publisher

Jack Lait, versatile newspaper man, short story and play author, has been appointed managing editor of the New York American.

CLEVER NEWSPAPER CAMPAIGN DREW CROWDS TO OHIO STATE FAIR

Attendance Broke All Records Following Drive by Fair Board and Merchants—"Attention-Getting" Copy Used Liberally

By CHALMERS PANCOAST

THE newspapers of Columbus put over the "Golden State Fair" of Ohio in a big way by giving it a lot of publicity gas.

Local advertisers tied up with a generous use of space which they paid real money for.

A great variety of clever advertising ideas, striking illustrations, novel contests and schemes were featured in the newspapers to make the State Fair the greatest in the history of Ohio.

The big problem for the past 50 years has been to get a crowd on the first day. According to custom the last days have always been the record breakers. The first day has always been an empty day—a day lacking in interest—therefore lacking in crowds.

But through a cleverly designed series of "attention-getting" newspaper ads the State Fair opening day this year broke all records. More than 50,000 people responded to the advertising appeal and made it the greatest opening day in the history of Ohio State Fairs.

For many years the Fair has been considered merely a frolic for country people. The idea this year was to make the opening day an exposition for Columbus people. The newspapers, Chamber of Commerce and local merchants got behind the plan—and using the power of newspaper advertisements made the city folks realize that the State Fair was not merely a show for their country cousins.

The Sunday newspapers carried ads from pages to fifty double, getting across the big idea for city people to "Fall In" on Monday.

The people were told to swing their old buses into the great "Driveaway"—a procession of decorated cars headed by the Governor and Mayor, which would start at the State House and travel toward the Fairgrounds.

The Governor rode in an antique auto of first vintage. Other models of 1900 carried out the "Golden Fair" idea.

The newspapers were sprinkled with small ads, showing a drum-major gaily marching away. The slogan was "Fall In—Columbus Day."

Nearly all local advertisers featured this "Fall In" illustration somewhere in their copy. It was a good tie-up. Then there were such cleverly designed ads as a calendar pad on which was written, "Gone to the State Fair," above the date of Aug. 25. Others were: A picture of a tally-ho party, captioned "Heigho—Columbus Day." A picture of a laughing clown, with the words, "A Large Time—And I Don't Mean Maybe—Columbus Day." A comic picture of a family rushing along with a small boy in the lead, followed by the words, "Take the Boy Along." Then there was a smart picture of a young lady stepping out toward the Fair Grounds, with the slogan, "The Only Thing in Town on Monday." Another clever ad was a bottom of the page streamer showing feet and legs on the march, the headline, "Everybody's Going" carried the message forcibly.

Page advertisements illustrated with race horses, bathing beauties, stock judging, milking contests, track meet, tug of war, etc., carried a story to arouse the enthusiasm of Columbus people over a day set aside and widely advertised for their special enjoyment and benefit.

Large newspaper ads featured the Buick Sedan which was to be given away free. The contest was for the best slogan submitted for the 1925 State Fair. No more than 10 words were to be used.

The State Fair has been using two slogans: "The Sun Always Shines in Ohio," and "Fairs Mark the Progress of Our State."

For the 1925 exposition a new caption to describe Ohio's great Fair was desired. Suitable blanks were provided and the persons presenting suggestions had to attend the Fair during the week in order to enter. The newspaper ad was headed "Free"; and illustrated with a cut of the car.

Other prizes were a thousand dollar silver fox pelt for the best essay of not more than 150 words on what the State Fair meant to Ohio. This was open to women only. Full blooded Airedale pups were given away each day to boys and girls. The idea back of this contest was to suggest a name for the dog, using the letters in the words, "Ohio State Fair."

The State Fair management clearly demonstrated that a generous use of newspaper space, actually dominating the display advertisements, would pull astonishingly.

Other widely advertised attractions were: Nightly Horse Show; Beauty Pageant for New Miss Columbus; Baby Contest; Boys' and Girls' Club Exhibits; Band Contests; Dog Show; Auto Show; field meet; horse races; milking contest; horseshoe-pitching contests.

There were other unique and interesting features, such as: "Queen Fashion" elaborate style show and pageant spectacle, fireworks, etc.

The most interesting thing about the entire program of advertising was the generous subscribing of money by local concerns for publicity purposes. Usually it is difficult to raise money to pay for advertising space. But in Columbus the banks, business houses and stores subscribed a sufficient amount of money to be used by the Chamber of Commerce in paying for pages of display advertising and also for prizes to be offered in the various contests. Naturally all Columbus newspapers featured the State Fair liberally in the news and editorial columns. Pages and pages were devoted to the stock and agricultural exhibits. And since the State Fair meant so much to Ohio commerce and industry the newspapers appreciated its far-reaching news and educational value. Even the cartoonists contributed liberally with clever ideas in big space.

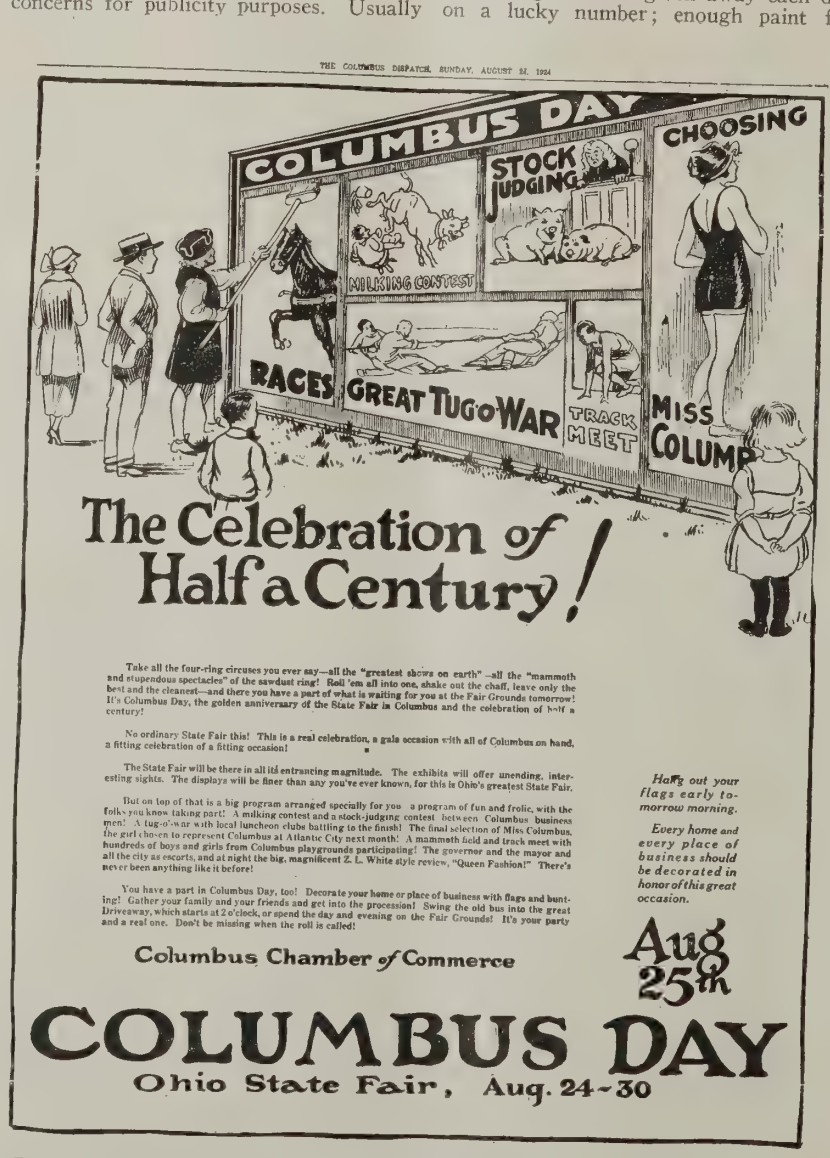
But the most encouraging sign of right thinking was the proper use of paid advertising to sell the Fair to the people of Ohio and equally to the citizens of Columbus.

Local advertisers increased their space in the newspapers to talk about the State Fair and its educational value and interest as a show. Other concerns used newspaper space to call attention to their display booths at the Fair. Even the small advertisers combined to make their advertising attractive.

The Z. L. White & Co., a large department store, presented nightly a Fashion Revue, giving a good picture of the history of fashion down through the ages. Newspaper display space was used liberally to sell this feature to the public—and get people to the Fair.

Manufacturers of food products introduced new goods by giving one free with every one purchased. In fact the selling slogan at the booths of exhibitors seemed to be: 'Buy One—Get One Free."

Numbered coupons by the score were given out as a chance on various articles given away free. Piano-players were sold to the highest bidder; vacuum cleaners given away on a lucky number; a washing machine given away each day on a lucky number; enough paint for painting a house free for guessing the number of bristles in a giant brush. Everywhere contests, schemes, stunts, advertising something out of the ordinary.



A coal company advertised two of its prize winning horses—named after popular brands of coal for publicity purposes. These horses were to compete for blue ribbons.

Everything seemed to be advertised, exploited, announced in some novel and unique way. Advertising was the force, power, the attracting current back of everything. You could not side-step advertising. It was everywhere. Barkers, signs, pennants, gay streamers with snappy slogans and slangy epigrams were publicity pullers of big value.

Flappers with noisy whistles, boys with fancy whips and shouting hat-bands, children with balloons, blaring music of the contesting bands, the musical din from the merry-go-rounds, merry-mix-ups, and other contrivances and contraptions for thrills, all advertised the Fair.

"Newspaper Row" was a busy place—headquarters for Columbus dailies and agricultural publications. A free checking booth for the convenience of Fair visitors was maintained by the Columbus Dispatch. Ice water was furnished free, also telephone service.

Columbus business men certainly know the value of newspaper advertising. They had a big curtain to raise, they wanted to make the first day of the "Golden Anniversary" of the Ohio State Fair a "hum-dinger." They turned on the power of newspaper advertising, and the result was that a record-breaking crowd kept the entrance turnstiles whirling merrily in answer to the big "Columbus Day" advertising campaign.

90 Days for Fraud Ad

One of the first prosecutions under the new New York State fraudulent advertising law was conducted last week in Buffalo by the Better Business Commission. David Gardner advertised in the Buffalo Evening News that he would sell anthracite for $10 a ton, $3 under the prevailing price. An investigation revealed that he had no coal and had made no arrangements for delivery in the event of purchase. He pleaded guilty to a charge of publishing false advertising and was sentenced to a 90-day term in the Erie County Workhouse.

Newspapers Not Factories

Newspaper plants in the state of Washington are not to be classed as mechanical establishments under the state law governing the working hours of women, according to an opinion handed down recently by State Attorney-General John H. Dunbar. The opinion was asked following a complaint by the Typographical Union that the Seattle (Wash.) Post-Intelligencer, the mechanical staff of which has been on strike since the last of May, had violated the state statute by allowing a woman to work more than 8 hours in a day.

WILEY LEADS A BOY TO GATEWAY OF SUCCESS

Wizard Business Manager of New York Times Candidly Tells a Youngster Rules of Journalism Which Yield Rich Rewards When Intelligently and Ardently Followed

By PHILIP SCHUYLER

FAITH. Interest. Ideals. Unremitting Energy. Resourcefulness. Study. Promptness. Judgment. Common Sense. Common Honesty.

Are these merely a string of neatly capitalized words to be festooned like college pennants about the brain room of a young and hustling newspaper man go-getter?

Or do they form a strong hemp rope, by which a man may haul himself upwards hand over hand from the lowliest newspaper position to the highest?

Negative answer to the first, affirmative to the second question came this week from Louis Wiley, business manager of the New York Times, who, at the request of EDITOR & PUBLISHER, played father to a hypothetical son, about to enter the newspaper business, and offered him advice as to the way to success.

It made an interesting game.

Mr. Wiley did more to make these words, which he used, seem strong and stable. He uncovered intimate details of his own business career as proof that the words were not mere sounds, signifying nothing.

"There are no tricks of the trade," he told his imaginary son, "as there ought not to be.

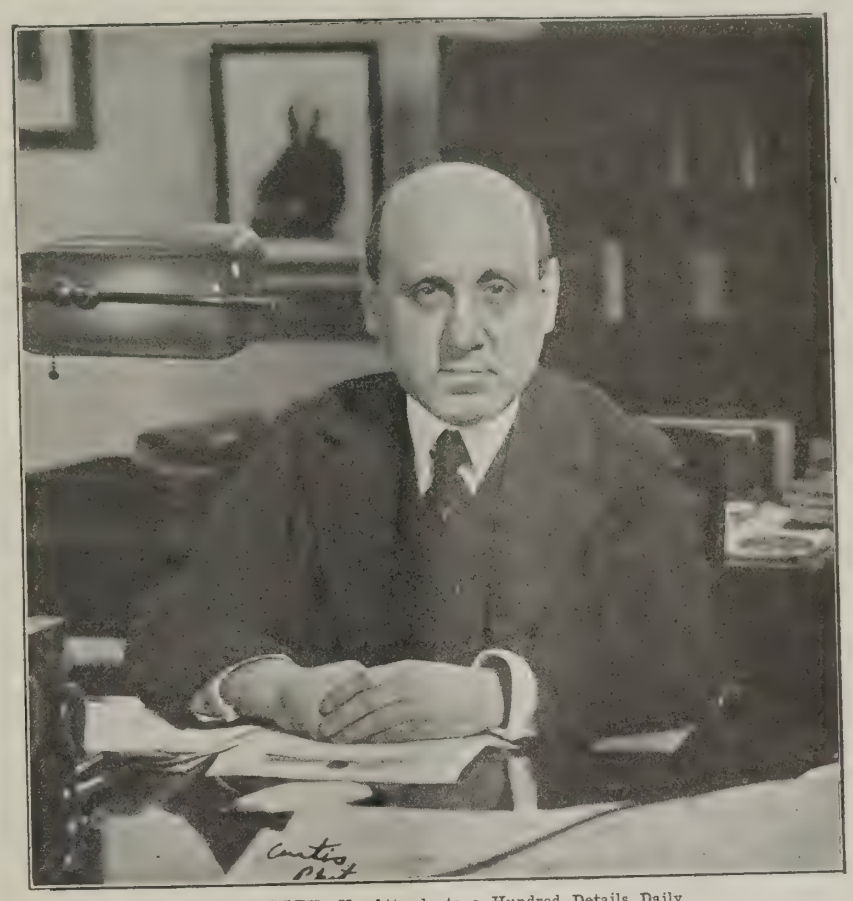
"Stick to the fundamentals—try to use, as Mr. Ochs has used, that genius for applying the principles of common sense and common honesty to the conduct of a newspaper.

"There are no certain details which are vastly more important than others. One thing a newspaper man must soon learn is how tremendously important some trifle may be on occasions, and how relatively unimportant some apparently large things may be.

"I pay attention to a hundred details every day—they may involve an insignificant decision, or a policy of large concern to one of the several business departments.

"Promptness in making decisions and answering letters and inquiries; being at all times accessible to everyone in the office, trying always to stimulate the business departments by making or welcoming suggestions; endeavoring to be just and fair to everyone with whom the Times has business relations, are the rules of business life I try to follow.

"The young man starting out in the newspaper business," Mr. Wiley continued, "should remember that it is his duty to bring to the support of the newspaper all the circulation and advertising revenue to which it is entitled.



"They are the bone and sinew on which the newspaper must depend to continue giving its service to the readers and to increase that service.

"The New York Times, for instance, now spends a greater sum for news than any other newspaper. Mr. Ochs has put the increased earnings back into the paper as a policy constantly to make the Times a greater purveyor of news. Suppose the Times were forced to exist on the earnings of 15 years ago. It would not be able to give its readers what it now gives them as their daily fare.

"The young aspirant should bear in mind that the newspaper business is a calling which demands unremitting energy and resourcefulness. In no other business must the line of effort be so constantly maintained.

"It may be that after a period of time he will have built up an organization which will permit him some opportunity to leave for a vacation and rest. That will not come soon. A lazy man had best not go in for newspaper work. The work is never finished. Today's newspaper is only got out of the way in time to clean the desks for tomorrow's edition. There is always work to do.

"Study good newspapers, clean and wholesome ones. Strive to understand the fundamental, stable values of newspapers. News comes first. There is no substitute for news. It is not a feature which can be bought away from you overnight by a rival.

LOUIS WILEY—He Attends to a Hundred Details Daily

"Study circulation building with an eye to permanence. Do not put into the structure of your newspaper a weak stone. Study your newspaper from the point of view of the reader and then from the point of view of the advertiser. Never be satisfied that there is nothing more to be done. Impress the policy and news excellence of your paper upon readers. Then attract honest advertisers by the number of the readers you have been able to win, and the confidence you have been able to gain and keep.

"Study newspaper costs. Spend money to improve the paper for the reader and to increase confidence. Be careful and prudent in other expenditures. Know the answer to every question a keen newspaper business man would be likely to ask you.

"The picking of assistants may be a gift, but I hardly think so. I believe that any intelligent manager should be able to appraise fairly accurately the qualities which employees should possess for the different positions. But everyone will make mistakes in selecting persons. All that anyone can do is to use good judgment in his first choice—give the ones selected a chance to work and grow—and watch them.

"What are the pitfalls to avoid, what are the opportunities to grasp?" was a question asked.

"The pitfalls to avoid," he answered, "in the business management of a newspaper may all be summed up as those which are a betrayal of trust.

"The newspaper, in its news, its editorials, and its business conduct, is all the fulfilment of a trust with the public.

"The temptations which will come to the business manager of a newspaper sometimes present themselves in insidious form. There will seem to be an easy way to obtain more advertising or circulation by methods which can be defended ethically but which will really be contrary to sound publishing principles. Whenever any temptation comes ask yourself the question, first, whether it is a betrayal of trust with the reader, and next whether it is a betrayal of trust with the advertiser or others with whom you have business relations.

"Never for any consideration attempt to influence or color the news.

"Honesty is the life and spirit of a newspaper. Never, to the best of your ability, permit a misleading or fraudulent advertisement to appear in your paper. The confidence of your readers is an asset with which you cannot afford to trifle. Never forget that you must defend the interests of your readers even before your own.

"The opportunities which the business manager of a newspaper can grasp are without limit. No newspaper ever has or ever will reach the full development of which it is capable. There are always new ways in which to serve the reader, new chances to develop legitimate sources of revenue from advertising.

'Never, however, miss an opportunity to gain and deserve the confidence of your readers. Be alert to know what interests the people in a clean and wholesome way."

But of primary importance, Mr. Wiley would have young aspirants believe, is steadfast faith in the opportunities offered by newspapering to "one who works hard and stands by the sound principles of newspaper making."

"I never lost faith or interest," he declared.

"I began, to go back to the very beginning, on a small weekly, the Democrat, in Mt. Sterling, Ky., when I was attending school there in 1884. My first real reportorial experience, however, was on the Rochester Union and Advertiser in 1887, although I made a slight beginning in Fort Wayne, Ind., in 1886.

"That was a great training school, both for the practical and the ideal in the newspaper business. Rochester, then as now, had newspaper men of ability in charge of its journals, and Jacob A. Hoekstra, city editor of the Post-Express, which I soon joined, taught me the essentials of good reporting. I began on the Post-Express at $6 a week reporting police court happenings and baseball, besides being dramatic critic. That salary was not out of scale for a beginner. The city editor of the Rochester Herald at that time drew $25 a week for his work.

"Early in 1893 I became business manager of the Post-Express. There is no essential difference in the interest one should have in a news or business position, and the opportunities for service, while unlike in many respects, unite in the end in the task of producing a good newspaper in which the public can have confidence.

"It was while I was business manager of the Post-Express that I met Adolph S. Ochs. I can say with sincerity that my real newspaper experience, despite the 9 years that had gone before, began with my association with Mr. Ochs, to whom alone the greatness of the New York Times is due. I am proud to say that whatever success has come to me I owe to him. It has been an unending privilege to work with him and to watch the vision of a newspaper which he unfolded before us. Let no one think that the path of the New York Times was an easy one from the start. It was a hard road at the beginning, and only indefatigable work and the genius of Mr. Ochs for applying the principles of common sense and common honesty to the business of publishing a newspaper pulled the Times up the hills.

"I enjoy the work in which I have been engaged. I enjoy the multifarious contacts with persons and affairs. I enjoy the knowledge that I have the confidence of Mr. Ochs and those associated with him in the making of the Times."

"LETTERS FROM PEOPLE" COLUMN VITAL EDITORIAL PAGE FEATURE

Creates Continuity of Interest and Acts as Safety Valve—Sustains Itself After Careful Direction at Start

By IRVING BRANT

A COLUMN of letters from subscribers has long been recognized as a valuable auxiliary to the editorial page. In it, those who admire the newspaper's position on public questions can flatter the editor with compliments, always graciously received and published with befitting shyness. Likewise, it serves as a safety valve, through which those who disagree with the newspaper can reduce their steam pressure. Many a threatened explosion has been averted by giving aggrieved subscribers a chance to get their views into print.

But while this function of letters from the people has been generally appreciated, few newspapers have discovered the possibilities of an expanded letter department for developing subscriber interest in the paper. Every publisher likes to think of his "family of readers." He is endeavoring all the time to strengthen the family ties. He would like nothing better than to have his readers so deeply attached to the paper that the cancellation of a subscription would be like a decision to leave home.

In buying features, the one thought is to create a continuity of interest. The best feature in that which not only makes today's paper interesting, but starts the reader to anticipating tomorrow's issue. A publisher will pay almost any price for such a feature, yet he has at hand a better feature than he can buy, and it is his virtually without cost. A letter department, built on both human interest and public interest lines, will go farther than any purchasable feature in establishing a continuing reader interest and cementing the subscribers into one big family.

Letters from the people can be built up most easily in connection with a liberal and spirited editorial page, because such a page will stimulate the readers, but it may easily happen that the letters will develop more interest than the editorials. When the letter department is built up to the extent of its possibilities, the editor is apt to find that four-fifths of the communications, telephone calls and visits relate to the letters he publishes, and about one-fifth to the editorials he writes.

A good letter department will not create itself, but, once established, it will sustain iself. All that is needed, after the growth is attained, is careful and sympathetic editing.

A letter department expands simultaneously in the number of letters received, and in their scope. It starts, perhaps, with regular contributions from a few cranks and egotists—sometimes readable, sometimes not. The first expansion is in letters condemning or congratulating the paper on its editorial policy. Next, it enlarges to cover a discussion of municipal problems and conditions. Then it broadens to include debates among readers on social questions, the morals of the day, fashions, etc. By this time, of course, the religious cranks are furnishing plenty of material for the waste basket. The well-rounded letter department embraces a selection from all of the earlier sources, and then expands to include a rich human interest offering. It is when this last field is touched that the department comes to exert a remarkable hold upon the readers, and to bring them into a great family circle.

Nearly all people who write to newspapers do so because somebody else has done so first. They must see letters published before they offer their own ideas. Therefore, in creating a letter department from nothing, it is advisable for the editorial staff to contribute to the letter column, and to keep it up until the department is self-sustaining.

Reporters may be invited to write letters bearing on news stories they have handled. (Or the copy desk might be asked to put its opinion of the editorial page into well expurgated communications.)

Nothing is more apt to bring a rise from readers than an occasional letter containing absurd over-statements and violent assertions of opinion. Get a controversy started, even if, at the start, you have to write both sides of it yourself.

A particular point should be made of publishing letters from subscribers attacking the newspaper's policies. This is the fair thing to do, anyway. It makes friends for the paper, and it is a great stimulus to letter-writing, for it convinces the people that the newspaper is conducting a genuine open forum, with a place for those who disagree with the editor.

As the letters increase in numbers, the same inside stimulus should be applied in other fields. Start controversies over politics, labor questions, jazz, bobbed hair, knickers, cake-eaters, spiritualism, woman's place in or out of the kitchen, the death penalty for reckless motorists and jaywalkers, auto lizards, and evolution. The letters on any subject should be strung out through successive days, while the interest lasts.

It will not be many months before the editor discovers that his readers are far more capable of guiding the department than he is. They can think of infinitely more subjects than he can, that will bring responses from the public. When the department really gets under way, there is no need to offer controversial leads. The question, rather, is when to choke off debate on any particular subject—for the writers of letters never know when to quit.

The letter department, if it is to be made an important feature, never should be turned over to a dub or a cub. If that is done, it will slump in quality, and may prove dangerous.

The man in charge of letters should have a thorough knowledge of the law of libel. Letters that have a kick in them are likely to be chuck full of libel, and it has to be edited out. Occasionally there is a deliberate attempt to use the newspaper for purposes of libel. The editor of the letters must be able to fathom the motives of the people who write them. He must exclude the libelous, the unworthy, and those written in a spirit of villification. He must recognize the fellow who is trying to put something over, to get free advertising, or take up a collection.

Most letters require shortening or other editing, and the manner of it will make the writer a friend or an enemy. What can be said if the editing distorts the meaning, or destroys the force of the letter? A newspaper is in a mighty uncomfortable position if it has to apologize to a contributor for putting him in a false light before the public, or refusing to make a correction because it would be humiliating to do so. It may be said that the writer of the distorted letter is only one person in a multitude. But he can do a lot of talking.

What is the test of a letter's value?

What should be published, and what rejected?

In some offices, the social or business standing of the writer seems to be the governing factor. Anything is published which comes from a well-known person. Everything painfully written in long hand goes into the waste basket without a glance. Such editing is grossly incompetent. It is the work of a cheap snob or a dullard. It puts cut glass above the uncut diamond.

Some letters have to be published out of a sense of duty, even though they are long and dull. Such are those written by public officials and prominent nuisances who think they have been wronged by the newspaper, and who can best be dealt with by giving them space to have their say out.

In general, however, there is just one test for the letter: Is it interesting? If it has interest for the general public—not merely for the man who wrote it—it ought to be printed.

In the magazine office, there is a direct relationship between the appearance of a manuscript and the probability of its acceptance. The well-typed, correctly spaced page reflects to some extent the training of the contributor. But in the letters which come to a newspaper office, appearance means next to nothing. The editor has more to fear from a bulky typewritten letter, usually dull in content and written by an insistent bore or a wordy lawyer, than from the crudest long hand. The latter at least is genuine, simple and sincere.

In a letter department built for its human interest and its wide appeal on homely subjects, the name of the writer means nothing. The anonymous letter is as good as any other, and perhaps a good deal better, because many a man, writing anonymously, will turn loose a personal record which never could be torn from him if he had to divulge his identity.

This, to be sure, is flying in the face of the conventional, parroted decree that "anonymous letters will not be published, although names will be withheld when requested." Yet what is that rule but a relic of the day when letters to the editor were mostly vicious political libels?

Some groups have to be chocked off, too. Among them the religious cranks. Sap-headed young men and women would dish out forever from the shallow contents of their craniums, if they were given the chance. When two correspondents get into a verbal duel, they never stop voluntarily, and their personal remarks have to be cut out at the start.

As a letter department increases in size, range and appeal, it acquires a power of its own, independent of the newspaper's editorial influence. A complaint about specific conditions in the city, or the schools, will bring quick action, to forestall a critical discussion. A letter revealing family misfortunes or distress will lead to innumerable offers of assistance—but such letters need to be scrutinized closely, and usually should be investigated by a reporter or by the public charity organization before space is given them. Once, on the St. Louis Star, I received a letter from a man who was incapacitated for several months, owing to an injury. He wanted the readers of the letter column to loan him $200, in amounts of $1 each, for which he would give promissory notes redeemable after he was able to work. The letter was published because its preposterousness made it interesting. The man got the money.

Also, it is advisable not to publish street address of correspondents who are willing to have their names used. There are bright citizens who make a practice of writing threatening or obscene letters to everybody whose name thus appears.

The interest taken in letters from subscribers is attested in many ways, other than by a volume of correspondence. When a single letter will produce a dozen telephone calls in a forenoon, it evidently has not only been read, but has made an impression. Wouldn't an editorial writer be flattered if he had stirred such interest.

If the letter department is to be built up for full effectiveness, it must have at least two columns daily. This will seem large, to those who are familiar only with the conventional department, but it will seem painfully small when the department is going at its full possible capacity.

A full page of letters in the Sunday issue is not only valuable in itself, allowing fine opportunity for classification and display, but it will make it far easier to handle the letters in the daily. The Sunday page can take up the overflow on important subjects, and can absorb many long letters which are too good to throw away, but which would injure the daily department by reducing the number and variety of letters in it.

Any person who edits letters, in a department operated to give the subscribers the widest self-expression, will gain in his respect for the unlettered men and women who make up the unknown majority in our population. They are far keener judges of the newspapers than the editors would like to think. Most of them are lacking in education more than they are in intelligence, and they can be reached by aiming at their understanding. Nothing in a newspaper comes more completely within their range than the letter department. Perhaps this will suggest something to those who complain that only 2 per cent of the people can understand what they read in the newspapers.

THE SPACE PIRATE

(Treated by request of half a dozen violent Editors)

You have heard of Robin Hood and Jesse James,
Of the Dalton Brothers riding on the plains,
And you've thrilled with that most spiriting of games
That's connected with the holding up of trains;
You have known the summer landlord and the crew
In the tipping line, with bright, expectant face,
But did any bally bandit ever get the nerve of you
Like the fellow who is always snitching space?

He may be the man ahead of something wild
In imported shows; or some fast candidate
Who is claiming some delusion for his Child,
Or lawyer with a client on his pate.
He may wear the clothes of charity, and come
With the outheld hand that never knows a shame;
He may come with rubber heels or beating madly on his drum,
But his ultimate objective is the same!

And the Editor, he softly swears and sighs
As he reaches for the wicker at his right;
He has grim assassination in his eyes
When another kind of Pirate comes to light.
And of all the office pests that ever land
There is none in all this struggling human race
Like the oily, silky Pirate with his copy in his hand
Who has just come in to make a plea for space!
(All sing!)
Brothers, soak him! Choke him!
Chuck him out the door!
Hurry up and get the lift in place!
Altogether now, let's hand it
To that bally brazen Bandit
Who is coming in to make a yell for Space, Space, Space!
To that fellow who is always snitching Space!

GONZALEZ VIEWS NOTABLES THROUGH THE LENS OF LAUGHTER

Young Brooklyn Eagle Caricaturist Blends Exaggeration and Humor in His Work—Drew Prince of Wales in Split Second Time

By PHILIP SCHUYLER

"PEOPLE are interested in many little things about personalities in the news, which the newspaper men often fail to mention."

Working with this idea in mind, a young Spanish-American caricaturist known to the general public merely by his last name—Gonzalez—has developed and brought to the American press something new and refreshing in caricature. He is now drawing for the Brooklyn Eagle and other newspapers, through an arrangement with the National Newspaper Service, Chicago.

"The public," Gonzalez reasons, "is vastly curious over such matters as the shape of noses, the twist of hair, the manner in which such-and-such a celebrity holds his or her cigarette.

"They want the predominate characteristics of the great carefully recorded and exaggerated for their benefit in the newspapers they read."

Gonzalez, therefore, with the quick eye of a natural artist, follows close behind newspaper men along the news trails. He notices details they overlook; microscopes the men and women behind the big stories, notes their characteristics and accentuates them in a humorous way in charcoal drawings for newspaper reproduction. In addition to his sketches, he writes down his conversation with his subject and obtains an autograph.

As the elements of good caricature are elimination of all detail and humorous stress of predominate characteristics, so the Gonzalez interviews are written caricatures of the various subjects who have posed for him.

I had watched with interest the Gonzalez caricatures which began appearing in the Eagle about the time when the National Democratic Convention opened at Madison Square Garden, New York. I met him for the first time on the Berengaria at the arrival of the Prince of Wales last Friday. This week I ran across him in the outer office, opening into the private sanctum of Flo Ziegfeld Jr., glorifier of the American girl. He was about to interview and sketch Will Rogers.

"Too bad you weren't able to sketch the Prince," I remarked, remembering the scrambled meeting between press representatives and the Royal visitor.

Rosendo Mauricio Gonzalez Has Something New in Caricature

"But I did," he rejoined.

"What?"

"Yes, it is the way I work always. It never takes me more than a few minutes. Of course in the case of the Prince I was rather crowded. My ribs were nearly broken in the crush. But I managed to sketch in the few lines necessary."

"Didn't you work from a photograph afterwards?" I questioned with the usual, and perhaps pardonable, newspaper scepticism.

"No," he answered; and he spoke sincerely as he added, "I never do. If I did the result would not be a Gonzalez caricature. I always work from life.

"But I wasn't able to get his autograph as I usually do. It was a great disappointment. The Eagle is now trying to arrange a sitting for me. Then perhaps I will get his signature."

Here was a story certainly—the one American caricaturist who managed to sketch the Prince of Wales from life on this present American visit.

In the office in the New Amsterdam Theater building, New York, where Gonzalez was waiting to sketch Will Rogers, we began conversation which was concluded later in the young artist's studio on Riverside Drive, opposite Grant's tomb.

Both name and age are tender subjects with this young caricaturist. His name is far too long and foreign, he protests and he fears editors will consider him much too young.

"I am an American," he insists, "and I hate people to think otherwise."

His whole name is Rosendo Mauricio Gonzalez, and I personally can testify to the correctness of his assertion that he is "not yet 27," and would guess 21 was nearer. Gonzalez would prefer people to think he has already arrived, is a veteran newspaper artist, whereas, one of his biggest charms is that he is now vigorously on his way, having just emerged from the scribble stage and having his great future ahead.

When I talked with him he was wearing a plain gray suit, quite lacking in Bohemian flare. Rebellious black hair, however, had a way of flopping down over his olive-skinned forehead and into his snapping dark brown eyes. He smoked cigarettes almost constantly.

He is very much engrossed in his work. To him his art is everything. He would submerge his personality quite entirely.

And he is delightfully young. His conversation was crammed with such naive comments as, "Henry Justin Smith (former Chicago Daily News news editor) thinks my caricatures are the cat's pajamas."

Born in Nadadores, a little town in northern Mexico, Gonzalez had his early education in Mexican schools. He began drawing while still in rompers, sketching his mother, his father, and his school teachers.

Then his family moved to San Antonio, Tex., and he learned English in the American schools. While in high school, he was almost expelled one year for lampooning and unmasking the teachers in an article he wrote and illustrated for the school annual.

At 16, Gonzalez started drawing caricatures for La Prensa, a Mexican language daily printed in San Antonio. For a year, he drew a comic strip for this paper called "Aventuras de Jose Luis y su Hermanito."

For a while he also conducted a column in Spanish on La Prensa under the caption "Caricaturas del Dia." It was daily satirical comment on the life and people of the San Antonio Mexican colony.

His first essays into the realm of caricature were of a political and vehement nature. His denunciatory, or as he calls them "bloody" cartoons almost cost him his life on more than one occasion. During the revolutionary period, he drew caricatures against the Carranza regime and was nearly shot as a very dangerous person.

"I have learned my lesson," he said. "Now I make all my drawings very good natured. And, so far as I can, I put in them an element of good will.

"I try to make people laugh at themselves and at others. It is very good business to make people laugh, is it not?

"A caricature," Gonzalez believes, "is not simply an exaggeration of one's features. There is more truth in the caricature that catches the characteristic. The characteristic may be physical. More often it's an expression or attitude which constantly dominates the individual. This leaves an imprint on one's face. That's character. I take that and exaggerate it clearly and forcefully. Then the message will not be mistaken or avoided."

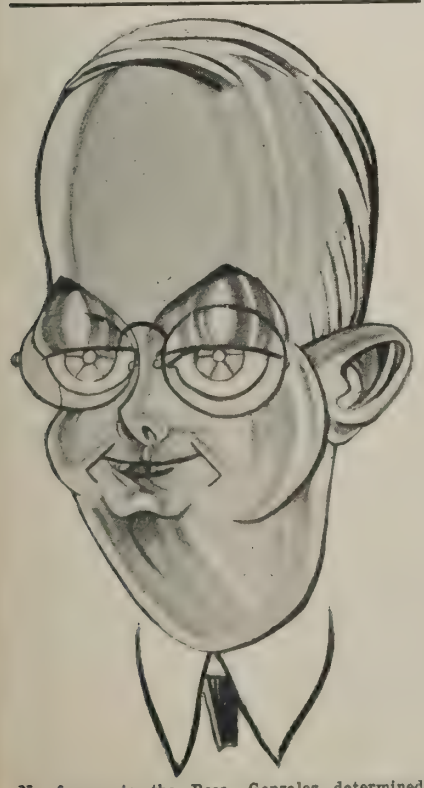
Gonzalez refuses to tell the story which must lie behind his trip from San Antonio to Chicago for study at the Art Institute there. He arrived in Chicago a raw young aspirant for newspaper fame about 2 years ago. Henry Justin Smith, then on the Chicago Daily News staff, became interested in him and his work, and gave him a position in the News editorial department which gave him sufficient funds to pay the expenses of his artistic education. He drew for several Chicago art magazines also, and then finally the National Newspaper Service offered him a position.

"I don't go around making thunderous affirmations about politics or the stage," he explained. "I just try to give as human an impression as I can, trying if possible to make my public feel they are sitting with me opposite my subject."

As an example Gonzalez produced the caricature of Harris M. Crist of the Brooklyn Eagle, which accompanies this article, and with it wrote this typical "Gonzalez interview":

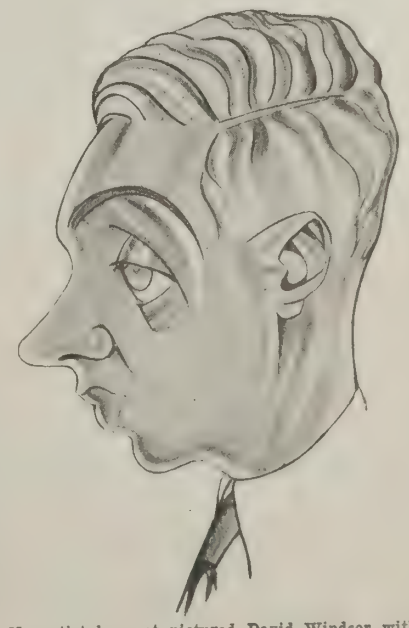
"The secretary to Harris M. Crist calls me to the 'mat.' Mr. Crist gives out conceptions on art. I listen.

"The Eagle's managing editor has seen me sacrifice many notables at the altar of exaggeration. I sit and wonder how the nightmare of his own face will strike him.



"I have talked to Mr. Crist many times.

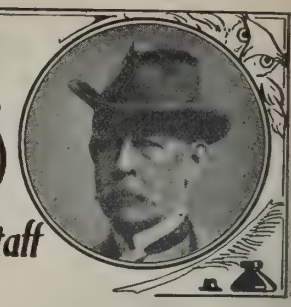
"One thing I always have in my memory of images after I leave Mr. Crist. That's the tightening of his mouth when he wants me to know he is thinking. Mr. Crist is about to make a decision when he does that. Two little dimples form on each side of his mouth.



"The design in the blue eyes is in the shape of little wheels. The pointed nose, the tightened mouth and the aristocratic remains of grey hair. That's the picture.

"I am about to be timid on this sketch of the chief, but it's no use. I am bound to tell things strongly. Editor or no editor, exaggeration is exaggeration. There is no happiness in soft pedalling, even with managing editors.

"Mr. Crist may return and order my long locks shorn and my ears pulled. I shall stand pat and still look through the grotesque lens of laughter."



No favors to the Boss, Gonzalez determined, but his job was still his after Harris Crist looked at this.

No artist has yet pictured David Windsor with these lineaments—but, then, no other artist worked with his ribs cracking in a jostling crowd.

NEW AND AUTHENTIC HISTORY OF THE HERALD OF THE BENNETTS

By ALBERT EVANDER COLEMAN—41 Years on the New York Herald staff

The petty jealousies and envious attitude of several of his contemporaries were not overlooked by Mr. Bennett but he very rarely publicly referred to them, but an exception was made in the very flagrant case of the Tribune, which published a letter in March, 1851, from the widow of "One-Eyed" Thompson,. a notorious character, declining to receive contributions for her collected through the Herald. The lady subsequently admitted to a Herald reporter that she was really glad to receive aid from any source, and had reluctanly consented to the publication of the letter; whereupon Mr. Bennett justly denounced the Tribune's "silly attempt to stop the subscriptions, and charged its insertion had been instigated by parties ready to sacrifice the good or the bad to promote their own selfish purposes."

CHAPTER EIGHTEEN

Remarkable Tribute to the Great Editor—Attempt to Murder Mr. Bennett—Presentation of a Service of Silver Plate to Him from New York Citizens

IN 1852 a South Carolinian anonymously issued a book, entitled "Glimpses of New York City," in which Mr. Bennett was discussed as follows:

"At the head of the heap stands James Gordon Bennett, and by his side stands that engine of terror to all evildoers, the Herald, and there they are likely to remain as firm as the Rock of Gibraltar. Bennett is undeniably the 'Napoleon of the Press.' Forrest in one of his pithy speeches, said 'he was the best abused man in the world'; but this remark will apply much more justly to Bennett. Since I have had a good opportunity to become acquainted with his private character, I will give you my idea of him as a man—it being utterly unnecessary to speak of him as an editor, for the world knows him in that light. In his habits he is as regular as the sun, or as the clock on Trinity Church; yea, more so, that sometimes varies—he never does! Moral in his conduct as any man you can find in a day's travel, even in this dense population; and I would rely upon his word with as much assurance of its being correct as I would upon John C. Calhoun's. To his family and friends his purse has no bottom, and I believe he has given as much or more to charitable purposes unostentatiously than Jenny Lind. I had as soon go to Bennett, though comparatively a stranger with no claims upon him, for a favor, as to any man I ever met. I do not speak this from the card, but from having heard others speak, who had received his benefaction. In his intercourse and dealings with his fellow men, he is particularly correct; he pays his printers, and, in fact, all who are in his employment, not only the best prices for their services, but promptly and without a wry face. It is proverbial with the printers that he who works on the Herald is 'sure of his pay.' I do not eulogize this as a virtue; I only mention it, because, from what has been said of Bennett, it is wrongly thought by some that he is tricky, and not disposed to deal squarely with mankind in general.

"Some few of his sub-editors (and he has lots of them) have from time to time, especially in his absence from the country, written and done things for which Bennett severely reprimanded them, when the facts came to his knowledge. I would as soon attempt to bribe Bennett to write or publish anything contrary to correct principles, as to induce the President of the United States to commit high treason.

"As a politician (we cannot rank him as a statesman exactly), he has as clear perception and foresight as any editor in America. His course for the last half dozen years has been strictly national. The policy adopted by our Government, in many instances, originated with and was advocated by him. His ideas of retrenchment and reform of governmental abuses are lucid and practicable, and must, if our Government exists much longer, be adopted. The manner in which he advocates measures smacks of the Salamagundi, ex necessitate rei, having various editors, and not infrequently is Jack-Randolpish! His style is not purely Anglo-Saxon, because he has not time to digest and critically correct his composition. His leaders are never stale or rehashed, and nine hundred and ninety-nine editors out of a thousand in a month's time would become dumbfounded, or be compelled to revamp their leaders. Not so with Bennett. He is always new—ever varied and spicy. Ridicule is one of his great fortes, which is the strongest lever to operate effectually on the minds of men. But enough of Bennett personally.

"The Herald is without doubt the greatest paper published in the world. It seems to me that it has its satellites, its newsgatherers, and its reporters at every point from whence an interesting paragraph can be scared up throughout the inhabitable globe. Its journalistic corps is practically ubiquitous, while the amount of its daily expenditures is truly astonishing, averaging over $500. The multifarious and complex business of this mammoth establishment moves on as smoothly and regularly as the machinery of a Collins steamer. Notwithstanding the great efforts at competition made by the proprietors of other newspapers, the business and prosperity of the Herald seem to be as great as if it had no rivals whatever.

"The Sun, the pioneer of penny papers, has, according to affidavit, the largest daily circulation of any paper in the world. Since the late separation of its proprietors (the Beach Brothers), I think it has decreased in value and circulation. It is taken only by the poorer classes, and I have never seen it in any first class hotel, restaurant or reading room."

About half-past eight on Monday evening, the 18th of October, 1852, Mr. Bennett came from his hotel—the Irving House, to the office. A few minutes after, a parcel was brought to him by one of the clerks, who had just then received it from a hackman with the explanation that a gentleman in his cab had desired him to leave it in the office.

The parcel was of a cylindrical form, about 6 inches long, wrapped in common brown paper, tied with green ribbon and sealed with red wax. It bore the name of Mr. Bennett as clipped from a copy of the Herald, and pasted on the package with the addition of the words, "Private and with care." Just over the address, and printed with a pen were the words: "Native silver and copper ore from the Cuba Mountains with letter inside the box."

When the outside wrapper was taken off by Mr. Bennett, it disclosed a small pasteboard box; on its side was written: "Specimens and private documents from the interior of Havana for Mr. Bennett (only). Should he be out of town, keep for him." Mr. Bennett made one or two attempts to take the lid off the box; not succeeding, he gave it to Mr. Hudson, who with his penknife, made an incision in the rim of the lid, when a substance fell out which resembled white sand. Suspicion being aroused, Mr. Hudson took a pinch of the "sand" and threw it into the fire of a grate, when it exploded with a bright flash. The box was then locked up, and next morning Mr. Baker, a reporter of the Herald, soaked it in water and then with two detectives present opened it. They found it was a most ingeniously constructed "torpedo" or infernal machine and that it contained such a quantity of powder, that its explosion would have been certain death to all who might happen to be near it. It was a most diabolically constructed device, and had it exploded in Mr. Bennett's hands, as its maker intended, would have not only killed him but also Mr. Hudson and probably another gentleman then in the room.

Mr. Bennett again defied his enemies, saying: "For ourselves we will not be deterred from the performance of our duty, were we aware that there was a whole manufactory of torpedoes in full operation for our benefit."

New York Citizens Honor Mr. Bennett

On the evening of Dec. 30, 1854, while Mr. Bennett, who then resided at the St. Nicholas Hotel, was sitting in his parlor reading a book, a box addressed to him was delivered at the hotel from the famous old firm of Ball, Black & Frost, the jewelers. Mr. Bennett having in mind his previous experience and narrow escape from death while trying to open a package containing an infernal machine, declined to touch it, and finally, Mr. Black of the firm was sent for, who quickly opened the box, disclosing a magnificent service of ten pieces of silver plate, enclosed in a brass mounted mahogany chest, and valued at $1,500.

Each piece had a separate testimonial sentiment engraved upon it, the whole forming a most impressive tribute to the recipient. The large salver bore the following inscription:

"Presented to James Gordon Bennett, as a testimonial to the editor of the truly National newspaper of the great American Republic; the firm and unwavering supporter of the Constitution; the opponent of the Spoils system of Government; the ready and effective advocate of the Rights of the People. New York City, January, 1855."

A water pitcher bore this sentiment:

"Presented to James Gordon Bennett as a testimonial of his independent and fearless course as editor of the New York Herald."

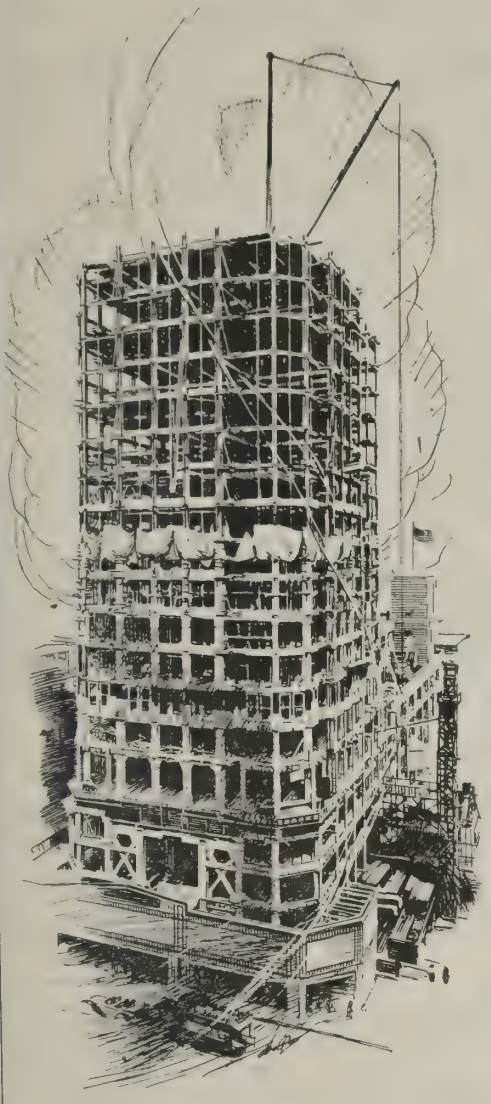
On another pitcher was a tribute from the mechanics, as follows:

"Presented to James Gordon Bennett for his unwavering support of the mechanics of the Metropolis of the Union."

Additional tributes to him were as follows:

On the coffee urn: "Presented to Mr. Bennett for the valuable assistance from the Herald for the advancement of the commercial interests of the Republic."

On the creamer: "Presented to Mr. Bennett, the truthful exponent of American interests."



On the tea pot: "Presented to Mr. Bennett, the architect of his own fortune; an example to the rising generation."

On the sugar bowl: "Presented to Mr. Bennett for his ability and fidelity in support of the Compromise Measures of 1850."

On the basin: "Presented to Mr. Bennett, the advocate of right and justice."

Claims He Was Kicked Into Art by a Cow

R. W. SATTERFIELD who draws daily and weekly cartoons for the John H. Perry services believes action is the backbone of a successful cartoon.

R. W. SATTERFIELD

In fact he ascribes his entry into art to the vigorous action of a cow back in his salad days.

"Kicked into Art by a cow—a rather inglorious entry. I'll admit, but after all I never did care much about milking cows," he relates. "You see, I was working for a dairy near Sharon, Pa., when one day Old Bossy went into a tantrum and planted her right rear hoof in my midriff. It was enough!

"I gathered myself up and decided then and there that my career would be newspaper art. It was less dangerous and the hours were shorter.

"The Cleveland Press gave me my first assignment. Later I went to the old Kansas City World where I became the complete Art Department. I drew every thing from a pair of pants to a political cartoon and did a little 'society' on the side. After considerable travel and some years with N. E. A., I came to New York with John H. Perry and am now drawing daily and weekly cartoons for his allied Services, Autocaster and the John H. Perry Service.

"My official 'hobby' is painting. And I actually get real money for the pictures.

"Early in my newspaper career I learned that action with a big A is the battle cry in all cartoons and illustrations.

"'Get action, my boy, get action!' Them kind words were handed me one day when I was drawing a cartoon on a municipal campaign. This editor, as a movie director, would make Doug Fairbanks look like John Drew. He could tell exactly how a trust magnate should be slaughtered.

"'Hit him with a 50-pound sledge and make him like it,' was his slogan. While I didn't always subscribe to his ideas, this editor theory of action made a lasting impression on me.

"A picture with a wallop will hold attention where a beautiful drawing, far more worthy, will fail.

"Looking around for a trade mark, I hit upon the idea of a little Bear. This bear has been my constant companion for years and all my cartoons include him. I wanted to advertise the bear some years ago so I went to the Cleveland Zoo and obtained permission to be photographed with a cub bear. This cub was hardly as gentle as my 'Teddy' and he had me scared to death before the picture was finally shot. On another occasion a Michigan friend shipped me a cub bear for a pet. The bear arrived in a crate at the newspaper office. An office boy handling the crate allowed the door to swing open and Mr. Cub was dumped into the office. There was a general scramble for the exits and it took an hour to corral the thoroughly frightened animal. The office boy never did come back."

POLITICIANS WIN AT GOLF

Defeat Washington Newspaper Men in Match at Burning Tree Club

Washington newspaper golfers ran true to form when they permitted John Barton Payne, formerly Secretary of Interior and a good Democrat, and C. Bascom Slemp, secretary to President Coolidge, an excellent Republican, show the way around the links of the Burning Tree Golf Club last week in a match in which newspaper men were in the majority.

The correspondents, consisting of the group that accompanied President Coolidge on the recent trip to Plymouth, Vt., were the guests of Secretary Slemp, but it was not politeness that made them shoot in the hundreds while Judge Payne got a 91 and Mr. Slemp a 94. In the match the team, led by Judge Payne and composed of Albert W. Fox, Washington Post; Carter Field, New York Herald-Tribune; Charles Michaels, New York Times, and William Losh, United Press, defeated the Slemp aggregation made up of Ralph A. Collins, New York Sun; George E. Durno, International News Service; Francis M. Stephenson, Associated Press, and A. J. Montgomery of the Republican National Committee's publicity staff.

The scores of the newspaper men remain a secret. Bert Fox got a prize.

News Writers on Medill Staff

Several newspaper workers are named on the staff of instruction of the Medill School of Journalism of Northwestern University, which opened registration last week. Miss Genevieve Forbes of the Chicago Tribune staff is instructor in specialized news interests. Others on the faculty are Walter A. Washburne, city editor, and Michael W. Straus, assistant city editor, Chicago Evening Post, Lewis W. Hunt, assistant city editor, Chicago Daily News, O. L. Hall, Chicago Journal, and George P. Stone, Chicago Daily News.

Iowa County Bans Billboards

All signs along the public highways in Dubuque county, Iowa, including even signs tacked on fence posts, must be removed within 60 days as result of the decision of the board of supervisors. Such publicity methods were condemned as detrimental to the appearance of the highways, confusing to motorists, and a hindrance to the work of the highway officers. Merchants and the Chamber of Commerce have been enlisted in enforcement of the order.

Commercial Essays Banned

The Buffalo school department has announced that hereafter it will not lend its co-operation to essay contests promoted as a means of advertising as commercializing any product or service.

Arthur Brisbane Recommends Shouting once Rather than Whispering many times

Brisbane's dictum that the wise advertiser shouts once so that all may hear, while the unwise advertiser whispers four or five times to small groups, is good sense.

In Cincinnati particularly it is folly to split a limited advertising appropriation into several pieces.

There is one Cincinnati newspaper that reaches the entire Cincinnati audience.

Through the columns of the Times-Star you can shout your message into every native, literate white household in the twelve Ohio and Kentucky towns that constitute the "local circulation area" of the Cincinnati newspapers, for less money than you would have to pay for a whisper in the four local newspapers.

Practically every national advertiser who uses two or more Cincinnati newspapers uses the Times-Star.

One hundred and sixty national display advertisers use the Times-Star exclusively in this field.

Experience has proved that the Times-Star blankets the entire Cincinnati market. Its local circulation exceeds that of its evening contemporary by more than thirty thousand and leads that of the leading morning daily by more than seventy thousand copies.

It doesn't pay to make two bites of a cherry. Four whispers never equaled a shout.

NEWSPAPER MAKERS AT WORK

By J. C. LATIMER

ROBERT D. FORD: Believes in co-operation with weekly newspapers.

HOW Robert D. Ford, editor-in-chief of the Richmond (Va.) Times-Dispatch, happened to come to Richmond is a story which would fit well in a moving picture scenario.

College days were over. At Marietta College, Ford had won his degree and the feeling of all college graduates that the world was his to conquer.

But back home in his native state of West Virginia, things didn't seem too promising. He wanted new scenes, new faces and more responsibility.

Consequently, one night, as he sat at his desk he placed a map of the United States before him and holding a pin poised in his hand promised mentally that where the pin point stuck, there he would apply for a job. As a matter of fact, it did not carry him far from home. Perhaps he peeked under half-closed lids just as he let the pin come down.

Opening his eyes he found the pin rested nearer Newport News, Va., than it did Norfolk, and a telegram to the Times-Herald brought a request that he come at once.

That was 20 years ago. After 2 years on the Times-Herald Mr. Ford came to the Richmond Times-Dispatch and during his nearly 18 years of service has filled the positions of state editor, telegraph editor, managing editor and editor-in-chief. During that time he has enjoyed his hobby—raising fine chickens and pedigreed dogs. His home at Dumbarton, near Richmond, is one of the show places of the community, charm being added to it by the wonderful flower garden, which is supervised by Mrs. Ford.

Unlike many executives, Mr. Ford's door stands open constantly, and the humblest man on the staff may enter to suggest something for the betterment of the paper, or to complain relative to a "masterpiece" which found its way to the waste basket. Harmony and co-operation have come to the editorial and reportorial staffs of the Times-Dispatch through the conservative rulings of Editor-In-Chief Ford, who, at all times, under most trying circumstances, has the paper well in hand.

Taking charge of the news departments at a time when State sectionalism was exceedingly strong—Tidewater, Piedmont, the Southwest, the Valley and the Eastern Shore being at loggerheads and hampering the progress of the State, Mr. Ford's policy to break up sectionalism soon began to have its effect through the columns of the Times-Dispatch. Standing for everything that is for the best interests of the old Commonwealth, the Times-Dispatch under Mr. Ford's guidance has always been strongly in favor of close communion with the editors of the weekly press. He believes that the weekly paper wields an influence in its community that cannot be estimated. Mr. Ford believes that the weeklies are not soon to be a thing of the past. On the other hand he holds that the weekly newspaper which is serving its community in an honest desire to better the conditions of the citizenry, to further the educational and spiritual advantages of the section it covers, will always have a strong backing, will move forward, not backward. Co-operation with the weekly newspapers has been one of Mr. Ford's chief ideas, and the special daily feature of quotations from State papers, daily and weeklies alike, has strengthened the bond of friendship between the Times-Dispatch and the rural papers.

One word sums up the success that has come to Mr. Ford in his efforts to make the Times-Dispatch a paper representative of a Greater Virginia, and that word is "work," for he is to be found at his desk from early morning until late at night.

"Mother of Newsboys" Dies

Mrs. Ida Rosenhaus, called the "Mother of the Newsboys," by hundreds of East Side New York newsies, died this week. For 15 years, Mrs. Rosenhaus had mothered the newsboys in the lower part of the city. To her the newsies went when in trouble; she staked them when they were broke; and took them home and fed them when they looked hungry. Her son was a newsboy.

All traffic records were broken this week in New England. Thousands and thousands of New Englanders were returning to their homes, their factories and offices. Other vacationists were leaving for their homes.

The wheels of industry now begin to hum with increased energy. Labor Day marked the close of the vacation period. This increased energy will mean a greater increase in the development of wealth.

This same date—Labor Day—marked the exit of thousands upon thousands of vacationists from this land of mountains, lakes and seashore.

These vacationists have left millions and millions of dollars behind them. There are many localities where this wealth will be the spending money of the New Englanders during the Fall and Winter.

Are you, Mr. Advertiser, going to secure your full share of New England's millions of new wealth?

The greatest newspaper reading classes in America are in New England and every reader is only a few steps, or a few minutes trolley or auto ride from a wide-awake store through which you are assured unrivaled distribution.

There is only one big way to create the demand, Mr. Advertiser; that is through the columns of these powerful newspapers of New England.

"COVER LOCAL FIELD" IS VETERAN'S ADVICE TO RADIO EDITORS

E. L. Bragdon, New York Sun, Tells His Experience in Building Tabloid Radio Section—Mail Service to Readers Invaluable—Avoids Theory

THE radio season is on—a season, which all authorities agree will break records.

Millions of dollars will be spent on advertising. The business office will see to it the newspapers get their share. In the editorial room the question is how to make the best radio section.

E. L. Bragdon

E. L. Bragdon, radio editor of the New York Sun, is a pioneer in the field. He was sought out for an answer to the question.

His suggestions to the radio editor, summed up briefly are:

Cover your own local radio field—syndicated features are no great help.

Behind the scenes mail service to reader fans, answering inquiries, is an invaluable aid to building radio sections.

Find out the direction towards which radio builders are pointing and lay future plans to that end.

Radio cartoons have little reader interest. They are better omitted and the space filled by an instructive article.

"How to Build It Yourself" articles are well received by readers.

Radio data sheets are popular.

Theory has been covered so often the public is tired of it. Don't bother with it.

"Generally speaking," Bragdon declared, "radio tabloids as now published fall in two classes: those catering to the experimentally inclined public and those making a specialty of the romantic and industrial phases of radio. In the former class the articles describe 'How to Make It,' while the latter class presents fiction and fact stories of the application of radio to ships, shore and commercial life.

"Since the radio section now published as a part of the New York Sun was the first in the field, making its appearance at a time when there were few manufacturers producing receiving sets for broadcast reception, we have been an outstanding exponent of the 'How to Build It Yourself' article. These articles stimulate the ingenious worker to further experimentation, thereby maintaining his knowledge of the industry on a par with its developments. At the same time such articles create a constantly increasing demand for parts and accessories, in this way fertilizing the field for the advertiser.

"And even though at first thought it might appear that when the majority of fans build their own sets the manufacturers of complete outfits would suffer, this is not borne out by actual facts. Most of the receiving sets described have their counterparts in some one or more standard sets. If the home builder completes a set, which, while not perfect, still demonstrates to him the worthiness of that particular apparatus he is apt to investigate similar professional sets and purchase one for the family use, feeling that the manufactured outfit would be more highly refined and more uniformly satisfactory than his own creation.

"The problem of obtaining material for a new radio tabloid is the same one encountered by every magazine in every field, namely, what would interest my readers-to-be? Because of the peculiar nature of radio this is a question that cannot be answered with a blanket reply. What interests the Chicago man may be old stuff for New York and vice versa.

"As a particular example, about two years ago a receiving set known as the Flewelling swept over Chicago like a storm, yet New York took no interest in it for six months, and even after this outfit was explained to metropolitan fans it failed to make a hit, and is now only a memory.

"On the other hand, a set which is now one of the most popular in use was given its first baptism in New York and did not reach the crest of popularity in the Middle West for several months. An editor gathering material for a new tabloid should find out the direction toward which radio builders are pointing and lay his plans to that end. But these directions are constantly shifting, a condition which makes it impossible for any editor to plan his work more than two or three months in advance.

"Policies vary widely on the point of service to readers. The New York Sun believes that service is as important as the tabloid itself. As a result, at least half the time of the staff is consumed by answering queries through the mail or by giving personal attention to readers who come to the office with their troubles. Some tabloids answer queries only through the columns of the tabloid; others answer no more than is necessary and discard the remainder to the waste basket.

"We have always believed that service given freely and gladly to perplexed readers instills in them a favorable reaction toward our radio section. Results so far have not caused us to change our attitude. As a matter of fact, the reaction is a much happier one than we had anticipated. It is a frequent, almost a daily occurrence, for a puzzled radio man to bring to the Sun office a clipping from some other radio tabloid or magazine with a request that we help him out of his troubles. Questioning usually brings out the fact that the man has attempted to get aid from the paper publishing the material, but finding the process slow and difficult has decided to impose on our staff the work which should have been done by another.

"For some reason, yet unexplained, radio cartoons have never taken well with the radio audience. When we have tried it we have been met with requests to use the space for instructive material. Some tabloids have used cartoons, but considering the space allotted to radio such cartoons are almost negligible.

"Syndicated material likewise has found few purchasers. The reason for this has been explained in a preceding paragraph. In short, New York conditions are not those of the west coast. Middle west radio is a thing of a different style from that which is current in the extreme south. Only theoretical 'dope' is the same everywhere, and theory has been covered so often that the public is tired of it.

"But radio tabloids are forever searching the country for radio features. For several years the Sun has been conducting a column called 'What Are the Waves Saying?' and the comments of its writer are widely followed. When it was dropped for two issues because of the author's absence from this country the daily mail carried many calls for its reinstatement.

"Another feature we have conducted for so long that radio fans consider it a part of their weekly pabulum is 'The Radio Data Sheets,' compiled by R. P. Clarkson. These sheets, four weekly, arranged for clipping and indexing, have been saved by thousands of fans for more than two years. Manufacturers, too, follow the data in them, and are thereby held in close touch with the tabloid itself.

"But such features are difficult to obtain. All told, throughout the country I doubt if there are a dozen outstanding features. More are due this season but few have so far appeared. Features similar to those just described form the backbone of any radio tabloid and act as a flywheel to carry weak issues across."

UKERS' CREED FOR ADVERTISING MEN ADOPTED BY A. A. C. W.

A PERSONAL creed for advertising men submitted to the Wembley convention of the A. A. C. W. by William H. Ukers, editor and publisher of the Tea and Coffee Trade Journal, New York, was unanimously adopted by the general convention at its final session, July 17.

The creed, which expresses the obligations to be assumed by all members of the affiliated clubs, follows:

"BELIEVING that the peace and happiness of mankind lie in some form of international concert and that a great force in promoting human brotherhood is to be found in advertising, the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World acclaim and publish the following code of ethics for all those engaged in the business of advertising; WE PLEDGE OURSELVES

1. To dedicate our efforts to the cause of better business and social service.
2. To seek the truth and live it.
3. To tell the advertising story simply and without exaggeration; and to avoid even a tendency to mislead.
4. To refrain from unfair competitive criticism.
5. To promote a better international understanding based upon a recognition of our mutual responsibilities and our interdependence.
6. To conserve for ourselves and for posterity ideals of conduct and standards of advertising practice born of the belief that truthful advertising builds both character and good business.

Mr. Ukers is well known in advertising and publishing circles in the United States for his organization work and the promotion of the best interests of the advertising and publishing business. He drafted the original Standards of Practice subsequently adopted at the Toronto convention of the A. A. C. W. in 1914.

For Ads and News Heads

Ludlow is indispensable says Supt. Parmiter of Utica (N. Y.) Observer-Dispatch.

"THE Ludlow is indispensable for both ads and news heads." Leon W. Parmiter, superintendent Utica (N. Y.), Observer-Dispatch tells us by letter. He continues: "For true economy, low maintenance cost and capacity for unlimited output under tremendous pressure, we believe it superior to any other system.

"The Observer-Dispatch averages thirty-two pages daily. With late copy, customers' proofs required, and early editions, we demand every minute on productive work.

"This we get by using the all-slug system, thereby eliminating the bugbear of distribution and pulling sorts, and taking advantage of any number of short-cuts that are found practical with the aid of the Ludlow."

ELIZABETH (N. J.) JOURNAL NOW HOUSED IN NEW MODERN PLANT

AFTER 36 years in one location the Elizabeth (N. J.) Daily Journal on Tuesday this week began publishing from its new two story modern home at 297 North Broad street.

FRED L. CRANE

The new plant spreads out, not up. The building is of Colonial architecture, with an exterior facing of red Ohio brick, trimmed with Benedict stone in imitation of limestone and granite. The framework of the structure is steel throughout, and the walls are of faced brick, backed by hollow tile. All floors in the building and the roof are of reinforced concrete.

Designs for the structure were completed after a careful survey of newspaper buildings throughout the East. An analysis of both the exterior and the interior of the building shows that it was sought to obtain that which would result in a minimum of exertion and the maximum of efficiency.

There is natural light in every room of the new Journal building. The large city news room is deadened to outside sounds and echoes from within.

The building is divided into two units, front and rear. The front half of the first and second floors are occupied by the business and editorial offices respectively, while in the rear are the press and composing rooms. The paper is being printed on a new Scott multi-unit sextuple press.

Frederick L. Crane is publisher.

Business Manager, Washington Post, Now American Publisher

Arthur D. Marks, business manager of the Washington Post for many years, has resigned to become publisher of the Baltimore American. Steady Flow of Wealth Comes from Farms of

IOWA

Iowa, from border to border, whether it be from east to west or north to south, is a great wealth producing area that is unequaled among states.

Iowa is a food state. Sixteenth in population, twenty-fourth in area, Iowa is first in food, producing one-tenth of all the food products in the United States.

Corn, the money grain of America, is Iowa's chief crop. The state lies in the very heart of the corn belt and is first in total corn production. Prices for corn and all other farm products have increased in Iowa so that the buying power exceeds last year as well as 1922.

Iowa leads the nation in hog raising, the number exceeding 9,000,000, or more than double the number of hogs in the second ranking state. Live stock produces the major part of the income of Iowa and it is quite profitable right now.

There can be no uncertainty of the buying power of Iowa. The whole state is prosperous. The people of Iowa will be quick to spend a part of the newly acquired millions. It will be necessary to present your product through advertising to secure your share of this business.

SCIENTIFIC

AS it is in line with scientific development, the proposal of the American Advertising Agents' Association to investigate and publish the qualitative factors in newspaper and magazine circulations will be welcomed in principle by newspaper publishers with open arms.

The newspaper publishers of this country keenly desire that the advertiser shall get the full benefit of every dollar he spends to lay his product before the buying public. If there is duplication of newspaper and magazine circulations, if markets are unsuitable for certain items of merchandise, if any unfavorable condition exists, the newspaper publisher, taking the long view of his business, wants the advertiser fully protected from loss.

Newspaper publishers have been the leaders in the movement for an ever higher science in advertising during the past twenty years. They have cleaned up their own advertising columns, to protect their readers as well as legitimate advertisers. They are first in the ranks of progress.

The important announcement made in EDITOR & PUBLISHER last week by Stanley Resor, president of the four A's, that his organization was about to create a research department for the express purpose of making qualitative analysis of newspaper and magazine circulations, was well received by the business executives of leading newspapers. If the work is done well, by men thoroughly competent to judge values and conditions, always guided and protected by established rules running for all publications and precluding possibility of mistakes of individual judgment, it should be a high contribution to the advertising industry.

Particularly commendable is the feature of non-exclusiveness of reports. The findings of the new bureau are to be available at stated intervals for general inspection by agencies and client advertisers, and presumably for publishers whose properties or trade areas are under consideration.

The Audit Bureau of Circulations is now generally conceded to have been one of the most beneficial institutions ever created for advertising as well as sound media. It concerns only quantity. Quality is undeniably another factor, deserving full consideration.

Nothing is so harmful to advertising in general as a mistaken and losing campaign. Any institution institution which may be set up to foster effectiveness and reduce speculative hazards may be regarded as a refinement worthy of encouragement. Increasingly advertising is becoming as stable an investment as any known in modern business.

Ten gallons in the can, radiator full, tires hard, grease in every joint, clutch in high, all plugs firing—we're off on the last lap 'twixt Labor Day and Christmas.

MORE GOOD NEWS

MORE good news from Kansas. Take it from Victor Murdock, of Wichita Daily Eagle: "Yesterday 238 cars of wheat came to Wichita. That's 330,000 bushels. That's $366,000. If you still doubt the prosperity of Kansas, just imagine 366,000 silver dollars dropping one at a time on a tin roof in a single day."

That's rattling!

It means that Kansas is proposing to the nation a 1924 toast in the form of bumper wheat and corn crops. Mr. Murdock estimates that the wheat will be worth $130,000,000 and the corn will bring close to $100,000,000.

"Suspended judgment" is the sappy talk of the money changers in the East, with minds fixed more on politics rather than on "business as usual." But in the corn and wheat belts and in hundreds of manufacturing centers the positive judgment of hustling, earnest actual producers is:

First class prosperity, dating from Labor Day!

To participate, you must first declare yourself in.

Play up the best story, whether it comes to you by radio or oxcart. The "best story" is the story which will be read and remembered by the largest percentage of subscribers.

ISAIAH

Chapter II—11

The lofty looks of man shall be humbled, and the haughtiness of men shall be bowed down; and the Lord alone shall be exalted in that day.

FULL AND FREE

IF the people of this country do not select the right man for the Presidency, it is not the fault of the newspaper press, for the news is being carried impartially and with wonderful completeness for all parties by all news services and there is not a city in the land which does not possess one or more newspapers which are not only equipped to print every phase of the national canvass but are disposed to keep their news columns wide open for full, free and uncensored discussion of the issues of the campaign by the representatives of the competing political elements, so that the electorate may act upon information.

This is the rock on which our form of government rests. It is the greatest single function of the free press. It operates!

When tempted to reduce the retail copy price of your newspaper, remember that the greater the income from circulation, the greater will be your economic and therefore editorial independence.

CHURCH ADVERTISING

THERE is a common belief that church advertising is a distinctly modern and American institution. We have before us as we write a copy of a Saturday issue of the Glasgow Evening Citizen, containing eight columns of classified Sunday service announcements, a total of 308 separate advertisements, and we learn from J. D. Brown, the London manager of that newspaper, that the churches of Glasgow have been advertising in the Evening Citizen for more than half a century.

An ardent wish is that advertisement writers should substitute "mammoth" for "monstrous," to express size—"a monstrous sale" must be something awful.

TRIAL BY NEWSPAPER

THE pious nonsense concerning "trial by newspaper" was classically shown up by an incident of the week in New York. The Pennsylvania Railroad Company, owning and controlling the Long Island Railroad, recently notified the thousands of Long Island commuters of a decision to boost fares 20 per cent. Public hearings were begun by the Transit Commission. The railroad was well represented by high-paid lawyers and press agents. The unorganized commuting public found a champion in the person of Maurice Hotchner, a lawyer, who took, without compensation, leadership of a fight against the rate increase.

Mr. Hotchner soon turned up some interesting information regarding the financial deals of the interlocking railroad companies. He made his findings public through the press. Ah, trial by newspaper! The volunteer lawyer on Wednesday came before the Transit Commission to proceed with his case and found a hot rebuke awaiting him. The Transit Commission indignantly denounced him for having given his evidence to the newspapers. The dignity of that body had been assailed. The charge was that the lawyer had committed a gross breach of professional conduct.

The New York World, in presenting this incident to the public revealed that, whereas Mr. Hotchner had frankly gone to the newspapers with statements of his findings, the railroad company had been doing precisely the same thing through its press agents. Said the World: "The Long Island Railroad sent last night to the World, and presumably to the other newspapers, a statement of the hearing as interpreted by its publicity department. No mention of this was made by the Transit Commission."

Search this matter of "trial by newspaper" through and you find that for every incident of ill-advised conduct by a newspaper in affairs touching court proceedings there are ten thousand incidents where the press has stood at the rail of justice as the guardian and protector of the public right, the representative of the man in the street. The danger is not that newspapers shall take too great an interest in public affairs, whether in the courts or elsewhere, it is that they shall take too little.

NEWS AS PROPERTY

WHEN does news lose its property value?

The question has never been decided, but that news does possess a property value was decreed by the United States Supreme Court in the celebrated Associated Press-International News Service injunction case.

Common practice, although wholly unauthorized, appears to be that uncopyrighted news which is published by evening or morning newspapers may be republished in rewritten form after the newspapers have had ample time for general distribution and reading. Thus, news published by morning newspapers might be rewritten for evening newspapers of the same day, or news published by evening newspapers might be rewritten for morning papers of the following day.

On the fringe of daily journalism there exists numerous little periodicals and radio broadcasters which graft material from daily newspapers and press associations. Recently we noticed in one such publication many thinly disguised news stories which had been originally gathered in the four corners of the world by the representatives of United Press Associations, Associated Press, Consolidated Press Association, Universal and International Services and cabled and land wired at huge expense. The grafter used the stuff with the assurance of a cash customer. Credit lines were not in his scheme.

News pilfering is a worn-out game. Newspapers elaborately pay their way. Ultimately the wheels of justice will turn out a clear-cut definition of the property rights in news. In effect it will be that the enterprise which pays for the collection, writing, dissemination and publication of public information possesses in such information property rights equal to those governing any other commodity in trade.

A. Clark of Butte.

"By Royal Command," Will Rogers, who writes for the McNaught Newspaper Syndicate, New York, attended the dinner given to the Prince of Wales at the Piping Rock Country Club, Sept. 4. The story behind the invitation is that Rogers in his articles syndicated to newspapers declared that reports to the effect that the Prince was a poor horseback rider were all bunk, that the Prince was a good rider, the horse he rode falling down and H. R. H. doing his best to pick him up afterwards. These articles, reaching Wales, pleased him so much, he insisted upon Rogers being a dinner guest.

The Value of Human Interest

The appeal of pictures is universal. They offer the shortest route to understanding. For certain classes of products—especially those which lend themselves to beautiful illustrations—the pictorial quality of Artgravure has no equal.

The Artgravure Section of The Providence Sunday Journal offers to advertisers an excellent opportunity for presenting their products in a high-class pictorial manner to more than 62,000 prosperous families in Rhode Island and the border cities in Massachusetts.

The steadily increasing number of both local and national advertisers testifies to the value advertisers attach to this section.

GOOD ADVERTISING requires good, reliable information regarding market conditions.

One of our "fads" is to know just what we have to present, outside of circulation, and to sell our MARKETS fairly, thoroughly and permanently.

This requires some "fussing" on our part, but it gives us a standing where that standing is effective—with advertisers.

FACTS FOR ADVERTISERS

Indiana is one of the best prospect territories in the Union; it is an agricultural, a manufacturing and a business state.

Indiana's first great wealth came from its farms, and agriculture still plays an important part in its trade life.

Its agricultural value is great, ranking tenth of all states with value of all farm property exceeding

$3,042,000,000

Indiana's industrial value is tremendous, ranking ninth in point of value of products with

$1,901,846,000

Of the total population about 50.5% live in cities and towns of more than 2,500 inhabitants. The number of cities with at least this population is 93.

Over 47% of the entire population is employed in gainful occupation; a fact easily accounted for when it is realized that the per capita wealth is $2,942.

Indiana was never more prosperous. Now is the time to reap your share of this prosperity.

Place your message for the selling of nationally advertised products before the people of Indiana in this list of daily newspapers and reach one of the greatest market units in the country.

REPELLENT, BUT BETTER THAN MOST JOBS, IS COLYUMING, MARQUIS SAYS

New Yorker, Bored with Comedy, Yearns for a Shady Riverside Inn, with Red Wine, the Old Gods, and Leisure to Dream

DECLARING that column conducting, while "repellent as a way of life, obnoxious and debased" is better than most forms of business with the possible exception of the liquor business, Don Marquis, conductor of "The Lantern" in the New York Herald Tribune, this week for the first time indulged through his column in Personal Confession.

"We may drag along for a while yet doing a column," the confession reads, "and hating it all the time, but for the most part we won't even attempt to be humorous."

DON MARQUIS

Personal Confession has become quite the fashion nowadays for the "hybrid, half-literary creatures known as columnists," is the way he explains his action.

"Heywood Broun, Frank Adams, Burton Rascoe, and others, are writing thousands and tens of thousands of words about themselves, their wives, their friends, their children, etc.

"We have always said we wouldn't do it. But today it begins to look as if we would have to—we can't find anything interesting to write about, so why not write about ourself?" he continues.

"We have always avoided telling the truth in the columns we have conducted, except by indirection. It is nobody's business what we really think, or believe, about serious matters, and we think it is quite an achievement to have written and published between three millions and four millions of words in the last ten years without ever having touched directly, more than two or three times, upon what we are seriously and continuously interested in. It would not be an achievement if the stuff we do turn out were unread and unpopular—but it is read, and it is popular. How does it come that we have been able to turn out all that stuff, in which other people have been so interested, without being interested in it ourself? God knows—we are just plumb gifted that way, we reckon; that's the only way we can figure it out.

"You can't have these personal confessions without the bad taste of such candid or coy self-praise as is evidenced in the foregoing paragraph.

"Our confession is not going so far as to reveal to you the matter which we are really interested in. It is only going far enough o reveal to you the fact that, as far as we are concerned, the humorous jig is about up. We may drag along for a while yet doing a column, and hating it all the time, but for the most part it won't even attempt to be humorous.

"We have grown to loathe, despise, hate and turn sick at the thought of all forms of humor . . . stories, novels, verses, jokes, paragraphs, anecdotes, whether they are really humorous or only try to be humorous, whether they are our own, or whether the author is somebody else. They nauseate us; they gag us. And we have not a friend nor an acquaintance who doesn't tell us all the funny stories he knows.

"Comedy is almost always cruel; we have felt it so when it has been directed against us, and we have felt it so when we have directed it against other people. It deals with imperfections, faults, crudities, incongruities, shortcomings; it strips away masks and pretensions; it affects a sympathetic understanding for the sake of betraying and exposing, and then mixes itself with sentimentality in order to hide its own cruelty; its basis is an exhibition of the flawed thing in juxtaposition to the ideal, the perfect; it takes sides with the irony of the universe; its climax and triumph is a frustration of some sort.

"Sufficiently mixed with other qualities, it may have a tonic and prophylactic value. But the trouble is that the habitual humorous practitioners become so pleased with the exercise of their own skill that they are as apt to strike at a good thing as at a bad, and there are very few living things that cannot be spoofed.

"In writing a column one acquires the habit of looking for the weak points of every proposition in order to say something amusing about them, rather than looking for the strong points. But we are not deserting the banner because of any suddenly awakened moral perceptions; we always knew the truth about column conducting and we never cared, and do not particularly care now, about the moral aspects of the hideous trade. It is not that we are deserting humor so much as that humor (and there are several very witty remarks you will make about it, of course) is deserting, or has deserted, us.

"We might as well be the first to say it in print, for before long, if we stick to this repellent job, everybody else will be saying it.

"Repellent as column conducting is, as a way of life, obnoxious and debased, it is better than most forms of business, with the possible exception of the liquor business . . . and that brings us to what we want to do with the rest of our life and how we want to spend our old age, if we are ever able to get away from this accursed grind of words. We want to have a shady little inn of our own, by a river, a small river, somewhere, in a country where civilization is not yet extinct and the sale of wine is not a crime. And we shall sit in the shade and drink red wine and think about the gods, the old gods that never were, in the early days of the world. And sometimes we shall do a little cooking, and sometimes we shall do a little fishing, and we shall not do any reading nor any writing . . . and mostly we shall sit in the shade and drink red wine and think about the gods. The idea of the inn will not be to make money, and if you should come and offer yourself as a guest and we should not take a fancy to you, you could not remain. But we suppose we will never get it; it is the things like that which you really want and which seem as if they might be so simple to attain that you never do get.

DON MARQUIS."

PAPER PRICES IN FLUX PUBLISHERS FIND

Confidential Meeting Discloses Inside Scramble for Orders Among Newsprint Makers Responsible for Present Jumpy Market

Is a newsprint price cut war impending?

Such a possibility was a short time ago and still is flouted by the paper manufacturers.

Many newspaper publishers are of another mind, however, and are watching developments in the newsprint situation with increasing interest.

Recently a number of publishers in close touch with the market, who have been gathering information for their own personal use, met to exchange views.

Their findings form the basis for this article, which, on the aforementioned authority, will tend to show that quite an inside scramble for special orders is under way among the paper concerns, and that in consequence, prices are already fluctuating, and that publishers are not being treated alike, not only by the smaller but also by the larger mills.

Concerns with the greatest amount of paper for sale, the publishers suspect of hiring new sales representatives and of making arrangements with new wholesale houses to hide their inside scramble for orders.

The publishers blame the supposed upset in newsprint conditions to the report that one large concern took away a big contract from another, thereby making the other manufacturers nervous and jumpy.

The survey of the newsprint field from the viewpoint of the publishers who attended this confidential meeting may be summed up as follows:

1. More paper is being made than used.

2. Publishers, wholesale agents, manufacturers and bankers representing them are carrying more paper in stock than probably ever before in the history of the trade.

3. Overseas paper, said to be in good condition, is being sold at from $3.30 to $3.40 f.o.b., Atlantic ports.

4. Domestic and Canadian paper will continue generally to be quoted at around $3.50 per hundred, and spot paper considerably lower.

5. Attempts are being made by some large paper firms, chiefly Canadian, to make 3 year contracts with certain eastern newspapers at $3.50, with a freight allowance, equalizing nearby mills.

6. Belief persists among the publishers that this scramble for orders, followed as it has been by a price reduction, may result in the abandonment of several New England and other mills in the United States.

The men who attended the meeting picture the International Paper Company as playing a "watchful waiting" game, holding off, wondering just what the other fellows intend to adopt in the way of price change. They see this corporation turning its manufacturing capacity to Canada, where they expect to increase their output.

As playing a similar game, the publishers class the G. H. Mead Company in the west, holding on without change, expecting to follow Eastern lead, and the Booth Company.

Carthage, it is pointed out, is selling at $3.50 now, and the publishers expressed the belief at the meeting that this price might be further cut. Belgo-Canadian, they expect, will change its contracts, but not until President Bierman returns from Europe.

DAIL MEMBER REBUKED BY IRISH NEWS MEN

Publicly Taken to Task for Questioning Competence of Correspondents on Floor of Assembly—Call Attack Unworthy

By Herbert C. Ridout,
London Editor, Editor & Publisher

London, Aug. 25.—There is a pretty row afoot in Dublin following a stupid remark made in the Irish Free State Parliament, the Dail, by a member, T. D. Johnson. He complained of newspaper reports and said, "Apparently the Dail, as a whole, has not impressed the newspapers with the necessity of appointing people who will give an intelligent summary of the work that is done in the Dail."

Promptly the Press Gallery Committee called him to task, and this was followed by the announcement that the Committee of the Dublin and Irish Association District of the Institute of Journalists strongly supported the action of the Press Gallery Committee in their protest against the insults offered to journalists by Mr. Johnson.

Indicating their strong attitude in the matter, the Dublin district committee described Mr. Johnson's remarks as an attempt to prove that the journalists who attend the Dail were incapable of giving intelligent summaries of the proceedings.

Subsequent explanations by the Dail member did not improve matters, the journalists' committee stating that "in trying to cover up his error he makes another outrageous suggestion—that reports are 'hacked' by editorial staffs."

The committee has given publicity to the incident and its statement concludes with some biting remarks that may be taken as putting the offender in his proper place. They say: "Newspaper readers are already aware that hardly any member of the Dail—not excluding even Ministers—has been given so much space in the newspaper as Mr. Johnson. Apart from the unfounded and unworthy character of his insult to journalists, it is an ungenerous thing to select for his attack a place in which his victims cannot reply. If Mr. Johnson's vanity is wounded because the newspapers cannot find room for all his numerous speeches, he must learn that he cannot be permitted to vent his disappointment upon any section of journalists."

WHAT THEY ARE SAYING

ALL BUSINESS WILL SHOW FARMERS' GOOD FORTUNE

"THE sharp up-turn in the price of the principal agricultural products will increase the actual cash income of the farmers of the United States close to a half billion dollars. It is inconceivable that this additional ready money should not have an immediate effect upon the farmer's buying power and upon his state of mind. And business in general already is feeling the good effect of both. The state of Kansas, for example, now is marketing a wheat crop of high quality and in excess of 150 million bushels. Our people are in better financial condition and incidentally are in a more optimistic mood than they have been in several years. The income of the Kansas farms will be at least one-third greater than last year, and this extra third makes the difference between good times and hard times. To a greater or less extent this same condition maintains throughout the nation. The farm market is a good market for the next twelve months and all business will share in the farmer's good fortune."—Sen. Arthur Capper of Kansas.

SPASMODIC ADVERTISING VALUELESS

"SO I say to you that there is a certain technique about this matter of dealing with the public, and if you have anything seriously the matter with you—whether it be a big advertising problem or merely a bad letterhead (and some of you have wretched letterheads)—there probably is some advertising doctor in your town who has made a business of the thing, and it may be worth your while to call him in. But in the meantime, and in this very informal and necessarily general talk, I say to you, 'Be genuine, be simple, be brief; talk to people in language that they understand; and finally, and most of all, be persistent.' You can't expect to advertise in flush times and live on the memory of it when you are hard up. You can't expect to advertise when you are in trouble, or about to be in trouble, and expect to get anything in that direction. It is a day-by-day and hour-by-hour business. If the money that has been thrown away by people who advertised spasmodically was all gathered together it would found and endow the most wonderful home in the world for aged advertising men and their widows. Don't throw any more of that money away. If advertising is worth doing at all, it is worth doing all the time."—Bruce Barton.

COMMANDING EDITORIAL RESPECT

"TO make a real editorial page you must first, know your facts; second, reach reasonable conclusions therefrom, and third, state your conclusions with absolute honesty and fearlessness, regardless of who may or may not agree with them. Such a page will command respect, which is more important than temporary popularity. If you can conduct such a page and are not doing it, you are overlooking the most important part of your job and neglecting your greatest opportunity for community service."—Marcy B. Darnall, editor, Florence (Ala.) Herald.

FAITH PLUS VISION

"FAITH plus vision, with reasonable schooling, are essential if a publisher is to win much success. This is true in a big city, in a small city, in a village in Montana or any other place where a newspaper can exist at all."—O. S. Warden, President, Montana State Press Association.

BRITISH PREMIER GIVING NEWS GRUDGINGLY

So Charges Sheffield Telegraph When MacDonald Takes Six Editors to Task for Alleged Inaccuracies in Reporting

By Herbert C. Ridout,
London Editor, Editor & Publisher

London, Aug. 23.—A political situation rendered more complex by what the British Prime Minister described as inaccurate statements made in the English newspapers led to Ramsay MacDonald summoning the editors of six London papers for a personal interview at 10 Downing street, Aug. 14.

The premier told them that much damage had been done abroad by inaccurate reports made in our newspapers about the Reparations Conference, and he asked that every effort be made to prevent the possibility of a public scare by over-emphasis of any crisis.

That was Ramsay MacDonald's view of the situation, but the Sheffield Daily Telegraph turns the tables upon the political leader with the suggestion that he himself is responsible for any incorrect statements by reason of the starvation news-service of the Government.

"Apparently," says the writer in the Telegraph, "the Prime Minister does not realize that such rash or inaccurate statements are chiefly due to the inadequate, grudging, and unevenly distributed information provided by Mr. MacDonald and his officials. All through this Conference, British journalists have been forced to rely on French, and even on German sources, and have found that they were not only profuse in information but usually accurate and up-to-date.

"This very day," the paper adds, "the Germans at the Ritz were able to give the very words Mr. MacDonald employed in conveying to the German Chancellor the French message calling on the Germans to accept the year's delay in the evacuation of the Ruhr."

WASHINGTON B. B. B. USING NEWSPAPER SPACE TO STRESS TRUTH IN ADS

Weekly Messages to Merchants and Public in Donated Space Has Built Confidence in Advertising, Bureau Man Declares

By LOUIS ROTHSCHILD

Merchandising Manager, Washington (D. C.) Better Business Bureau

"IT'S nothing but advertising. You can't believe what you see in the paper!"

This is the statement Better Business Bureaus of the country are trying to annihilate by an intensive campaign for "Truth in Advertising."

Not so long ago distrust of advertising, and the merchants behind it, was so marked as to bring business below its normal level in many cities.

In an investigation of 40 cities, the Business Bureaus found that the great bulk of advertising was sound and conservative, and only a small portion untruthful and intentionally misleading.

Realizing this, a news consciousness has come into the Truth in Advertising movement. Better Business Bureaus are not interested in technical truthfulness; they are interested in advertising that builds confidence and makes the public respect all advertising.

The most interesting feature of this movement to build confidence in advertising by advertising has been carried on by the Washington Better Business Bureau in the forms of display advertising in local newspapers. Washington newspapers during the past year have devoted an advertisement a week to a message from the Bureau for Truth in Advertising. These advertisements have been 4 and 5 columns wide and from 8 to 12 inches in length.

The messages from the Bureau have been directed to both the merchants and to the public. They are constructive and are really advertising that sells advertising to the public. In drawing up these advertisements there has been an effort not to say anything that will confirm the sentiment that advertising is truthful, but rather to emphasize that advertisements which conform to the recommendations of the Better Business Bureau are truthful. Of course, the fact that merchants read these advertisements and are influenced to follow the standards for Truth in Advertising makes them a double-edged sword.

The first 9 of these advertisements printed last summer were published shortly after the reorganization of the Washington Bureau with Howard M. Cool, formerly of the Cleveland Bureau, as director. These introductory advertisements established a series of technical standards covering comparative prices and like questionable, though unintentional, use of trade terms. The advertisement "Lest We Forget" summarized these standards. In introducing them they should be disseminated 10 days prior to publication to the merchants so that when the advertisement to the merchants and to the public appeared, advertising would conform. The public could therefore see that merchants were making an effort to co-operate together for Truth.

A typical advertisement of those printed since the technical stories were completed, and one that clearly shows the constructive trend, follows:

"AN ADVERTISEMENT OF ADVERTISING

"Twenty years ago advertising was an experiment. Today it is a necessity; it is the logical means by which the seller may acquaint the buyer of his merchandise.

"Advertising is truthful. An untruth cannot stand the test of time. Advertising by its very vitality and growth demonstrates its merit to warrant the confidence of the public.

"Over four years ago representative Washington business men realized that some advertisements misled the public. Realizing that in a barrel of apples one spoiled one could easily contaminate all, the Better Business Bureau was organized to prevent contamination of advertising.

"It is gratifying that the Better Business Bureau can report that generally Washington Advertising is truthful and warrants the confidence of the public.

"THE BETTER BUSINESS BUREAU OF WASHINGTON"

The newspaper space devoted to these advertisements is donated by the various newspapers. The messages are printed in Washington's two leading afternoon papers on Saturday and in the two morning papers the following Monday.

The Washington Better Business Bureau has discovered that the most efficient way to build public confidence in advertising and to make advertising warrant confidence is by advertising. A similar campaign is being planned for the coming year in which messages to the public from the Bureau for Truth in Advertising will sell the believability of the printed word to the 450,000 residents in the capital.

Porter Buys Barber Interests

Harry Porter, formerly advertising manager of the Pepsin Syrup Company, Monticello, Ill., has purchased the interests of the Earle S. Barber Company of Chicago. A branch of the Earle S. Barber Company will be established at Monticello, and for the present contracts will be issued from that office. A list of newspapers on the Pepsin Syrup Company is now being prepared by Mr. Porter, who will divide his time between the Chicago and Monticello offices.

SCIENTISTS TO INVESTIGATE NEWS SOURCES

ing associations and of the American press as a whole. Nobody is more eager than the newspaper editor for a ruthless exposure of all doctorers of news, especially those which touch foreign affairs.

Officials of the American Society of Newspaper Editors, it is known, have had in contemplation on behalf of the profession just such an investigation. It is wholly probable that this organization will co-operate practically with the movement of which Professor Miller is the directing head.

Such a step would prove the open-mindedness of the American press. It would deliver the project from unthinking criticism by the papers. It would remove the stigma of "muck-raking" from the committee. It would materially aid the scientists in their work. And, most important of all, it would go far to remove in advance the widespread suspicion of the good faith of the press.

Newspaper men, because they know the facts, do not take seriously enough the current criticism of the newspapers and press associations, as tools of a variety of special interest. Again and again I have heard clergymen and educators, as well as ordinary laymen, declare that the Associated Press is controlled by a certain religious influence, or by specified financial interests. Only this week the alert young pastor of a large congregation asked me if this is not true. He was greatly surprised when he learned the facts.

Reassurance such as every newspaper man is called upon to give to suspicious and misinformed individuals would be conveyed to the whole world by the findings of the commission. Such a needed heartening of public confidence in the press is of no small importance in this day of distrust of most of the constituted agencies of a democracy.

That is the public side of the subject. Professionally, all makers of newspapers may give thanks for this wholesale research into the sincerity and disinterestedness of foreign news especially; because all of them are unwilling victims of pernicious propaganda from abroad. Editors, above all others, want to have laid bare the centers and methods of news-coloration.

This commission of scientists may be expected to tabulate, fearlessly and fairly, which foreign governments exercise censorship over news, and to what extent. Also it will reveal the existence of proved propaganda agencies and their methods. In all the wide world there are no men so eager for the cold facts about Great Britain and France and Italy and Germany and Turkey and Greece and Armenia and Japan and China and India and Russia and Zionism and a score of other subjects of international news as the men who sit at the desks of the daily newspapers of America.

Let the scientists point out the news-crooks: the editors will promptly attend to their elimination. Then public confidence in the press will be reestablished, and world concord will be promoted. For peace can never come to the world so long as liars may tinker with the complicated machinery of general information.

New Church Copy Ready

Proofs are now available, free on request, of Series No. 6 of Church advertisements.

This series has 52 pieces of copy designed to be used on behalf of all the churches in a community to urge men to attend the church of their choice. It is undenominational, avoids controversial subjects, can be used in any town.

Use of this copy is sold to only one paper in a town. The price is almost nothing: 3 cents per thousand circulation per week. Thus a paper with 10,000 circulation would pay $15.60 for this year's supply.

There are special ads for special days.

Write for proofs at once. See if you cannot arrange to use them, either as a contribution of your paper toward a better community and good will, or in space paid for by a group of merchants and professional men.

Herbert H. Smith, 723 Witherspoon Bldg., Philadelphia, has the proofs.

Our Own World of Letters

By JAMES MELVIN LEE

IF I were asked to select for the newspaper library the most important acquisition for 1924 I should unquestionably name "These Eventful Years" just published by the Encyclopædia Britannica. Briefly, these two volumes tell the story of the twentieth century in the making—told in this instance by many of its makers. At a time when propaganda is put forth in such gigantic proportions it is especially important to have a set of volumes where the truth can be printed without fear of an editor's blue pencil. "These Eventful Years" will, of course be reviewed more in detail in this department.

AN editorial in The Nation for Sept. 3, is headed "The Helpless Associated Press." A recent ruling of that organization is discussed to the extent of a column and a quarter, but a review of "The Principles of Journalism" by Casper S. Yost, president of the American Society of Newspaper Editors, (D. Appleton & Co.) fills 7 lines. It is described as "an innocuous volume which should get a handsome reception from the daily press." The fairness of this review would be a good topic for discussion at the next meeting of the American Society of Newspaper Editors.

This issue of The Nation, however, has an interesting answer to the question "Has the old-fashioned clam-chowder vanished?"—a question recently asked the New York World by a correspondent.

The only fault The Nation finds with the novel "I'll Show You the Town" by Elmar Davis (Robert M. McBride and Company) is that the yarn should have "been condensed to two-thirds of its present length." Until recently Mr. Davis was a member of the editorial staff of the New York Times.

KEITH PRESTON, who conducts a weekly column of literary criticism. "The Periscope," and a daily column of humor, "Hit or Miss" in the Chicago Daily News, does an interesting skit on teaching Greek for the September issue of The Bookman. Whether one has ever read Xenophon's "Anabasis" or not one will like this skit by Preston. Personally, I have always thought that Xenophon's account of the retreat of the 10,000 Greeks could be made interesting to a class if handled as a bit of war correspondence for the information of those who watched the bulletin boards—or to be more exact, the wax tablets—on the thoroughfares of Athens.

Speaking not as a newspaper man, but as a teacher of Greek, Preston naively concludes his skit:

> We always labored not to be gored on either horn of G. Bernard Shaw's wicked thrust: "Few of them know Greek and none of them knows anything else."

WILLIAM ALLEN WHITE, who edits the Emporia (Kan.) Gazette will publish this fall through the MacMillan Company "Politics The Citizen's Business." Bill, being a good editorial writer evidently feels the need of a good book on a topic which occupies so much space on the editorial page, and so has undertaken to prepare one.

ELMER DAVIS, who once did such excellent work on the staff of the New York Times, contributes to Harper's Magazine for September "The Deduction of Mr. Jinks." It will be found in the department headed "The Lion's Mouth."

* * *

THE weekly news magazine, Time, in its issue for Aug. 25, elaborates at some lenth on the editorial in which EDITOR & PUBLISHER reported a decision of the Berlin Chamber Court that a newspaper has no right to print a person's picture contrary to his will.

Time cites a number of illustrations of which the following is typical:

> Another was the travesty of Anthony Comstock, famed moral crusader, published in The Masses for June, 1915. A naked man, in the flabby paunchiness of inactive middle-age, suddenly exposed by the parting of curtains, shrank shamefully away to cover his condition. The title of the picture was: "The Nude is Repulsive to This Man."

AS "Joseph Pulitzer As He Was" by Don C. Seitz in the Atlantic Monthly for September is simply a portrait taken from the biography of Mr. Pulitzer soon to be published by Mr. Seitz, I shall not comment on the article, but wait for the publication of the book. I do want to mention another article in the Atlantic, "So This is Tammany Hall," by William L. Chenery, until recently editor of the New York Telegram-Mail. In submitting his article to the editor of the Atlantic Mr. Chenery wrote:

> I have long believed that journalism—in New York, at any rate—would be much sounder if editors or, better, owners, understood why it is Tammany has never been divorced from the affection of the people.

A PICTURESQUE glimpse of the press in Chile will be found in an article published in the Christian Science Monitor for Aug. 22. Its author, Wallace Thompson, discusses not only the native press, but also the English press. In his opinion, Chilean cities have the most interesting press on the west coast of South America.

THREE articles in the American Magazine for September might very appropriately be marked "Must" for newspaper men. They are: "Your Face is Perfectly Simple, But I Can't Place Your Name" by H. I. Phillips, who won his spurs on the New York Globe; "I Have Met 10,000 Ships in New York Bay" by Samuel A. Wood, who is dean of the ship news reporters covering the port of New York, and "This Cartoonist Gives Us a Look at Ourselves" by John Monk Saunders—an article which is a thumbnail sketch of H. T. Webster, who draws "The Thrill That Comes Once in a Lifetime," "Life's Darkest Moment," and other cartoon series syndicated to many newspapers.

Of these three articles possibly the most interesting to the working press is the last. In speaking of one of his most famous cartoons Mr. Webster says:

> I still hear about a cartoon I drew on Lincoln's Birthday 6 years ago. It represents two neighbors of Abraham Lincoln's father commiserating with each other over the fact that "nuthin' ever happens around here. A boy was born over at Tom Lincoln's cabin this morning, but that's all."

* * *

EARL H. Emmons, who is news editor of the American Printer, is a good newspaper man. I see no reason why I should whisper it softly that he is also a poet with a message. If you don't believe it glance through his recent book of verse, "Mavericks" (Oswald Publishing Company). While you have the book in your hand you should not skip the two pages introducing Bill Hooker, who edits the Erie Railroad Magazine and is the author of that classic of the plains, "The Prairie Schooner."

By the way the prairie schooner was the invention of Gail Borden, real founder of journalism in Texas.

REPORTERS will find some valuable tips on the value of direct approach in securing interviews if they will glance over the article by O. O. McIntyre in Liberty Magazine for Sept. 6. Two typical illustrations are when McIntyre obtained an interview with Northcliffe and when Irvin S. Cobb obtained a big story for the New York Evening World from William Travers Jerome.

The same issue of Liberty contains "The Battle Royal in the A. P." by Harper Leech. It describes somewhat in detail the attempt of the Baltimore Evening Sun and the Rochester Times-Union to obtain memberships in the Associated Press. It was this same attempt that drew such a hot shot from The Nation in an editorial.

H. L. MENCKEN reviews "Cobb of the World" (E. P. Dutton and Company) in the American Mercury for September. To be perfectly frank, the book is a peg on which Mencken hangs his hat while he harangues readers about editorial writers. His views about those who conduct editorial pages are thus summed up in his concluding paragraph:

> Editorial writers, in the overwhelming main, are men with nothing to say. They write about public affairs every day, and yet have no ideas about them. Most of the fruitful thinking about the matters that concern them professionally is done by men outside their ranks.

John Farrar, who edits The Bookman, also reviews "Cobb of The World" in the September issue of his magazine. Farrar describes Cobb as one of the most striking and most modest men he ever met. The two reviews ought to be run in parellel columns. It is hard to imagine two reviews of the same book farther apart in their mode of treatment.

(Washington Correspondent, Editor & Publisher)

Washington, D. C., Sept. 3.—Robert W. Woolley, who directed the publicity for the Democratic party in the national campaigns of 1912 and 1916, has been appointed chairman of the committee on publicity of the Democratic National Committee and will have general charge of the work in the 1924 campaign. Woolley worked on the New York World before he became active in Democratic politics and was Director of the Mint in the first term of the Wilson administration and later a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The active staff in charge of publicity at the Washington headquarters of the committee will be Richard Linthicum, director of publicity; Clifford Snider and Grattan Kerans, assistants; Mrs. Marion Bannister, vice-chairman of the publicity committee in charge of women's publicity, and Richard S. Jones, organizer of the Davis Clubs.

Linthicum came to the Democratic National Committee from the editorial staff of the New York World where he served 9 years, following his Chicago experiences which included the managing editorships of the old Chicago Times and the Chicago Journal.

Kerans is a newspaper man who has seen service in Chicago, St. Louis, Columbus and Toledo, and was connected with National Catholic Welfare Council News Service for two years before joining the present national committee in 1922.

Mrs. Bannister is of the Glass family of Virginia newspaper fame. She is sister of Senator Carter Glass, publisher of the Lynchburg News, and daughter of Colonel Robert H. Glass, an editor for 50 years. Mrs. Bannister conducted two departments on the Lynchburg News and corresponded for Virginia papers before she essayed the publicity game in Washington. During the war she was on the editorial staff of the information service of the Department of Labor conducted by Roger Babson. She came to Democratic National Committee in 1921 and is editor of "The Fortnightly Review," a Democratic publication for women voters.

Newcomb Carlton and Cyrus Field Descendants at Ceremony

The new cable will extend from Rockaway to the Azores, thence to Malaga, Spain, and to Italy.

It is to serve not only Italy but Southern and Central Europe, but is to be connected ultimately with a cable to be laid from the Azores to Emden, Germany.

The American end of the cable was brought ashore from the Italian cable ship Colonia, anchored three miles at sea.

It is expected to transmit 1,500 letters a minute, whereas the highest speed so far reached is only about 300 letters a minute.

Among those who attended the landing were Newcomb Carlton, president of the Western Union Telegraph Company; J. C. Welliver, vice-president; J. Lister, United States cable manager of the Western Union; F. E. Jewett, vice-president of the Western Electric Company; Edward M. Field, son of the late Cyrus Field, who laid the first trans-Atlantic cable; Col. William Field Judson, grandson of Cyrus Field; Col. Cyrus Field Judson, another grandson, and Cyrus Field Judson, jr., great-grandson.

Writings Listed as Capital Stock

For the first time in Texas, part of the capital stock of a publishing corporation is represented by the contract of an author to deliver his future writings for a period of ten years to the company. Texas historical works of Sam Houston Dixon, both copyrights and manuscript, were included for $60,000 of the $100,000 capital stock of the Texas Historical Publishing Company of Houston, incorporated this week. Incorporators are Sam Houston Dixon, J. Elmer Sieber and S. Hayne Dixon.

Amalgamated Press Profits High

The Amalgamated Press, Ltd., of which Sir George Sutton is chairman, is always watched with interest in British newspaper and publishing circles because it is the section of the late Lord Northcliffe business in which were concentrated the popular periodicals upon which the great publisher founded the Daily Mail—the original being the paper Answers. Over half a million sterling profit (the exact amount is £540,403) has been made in the year ending June 30, and the report states that the revenue derived from advertisements has again exceeded that of any previous year.

Fire Wrecks Texas Plant

The plant of the Odell (Tex.) News was burned Aug. 28, with a loss of $20,000. Building and paper were owned by H. H. Weimbold. None of the machinery was saved.

BUSINESS TICKLER

PUMPKIN ready for a dash of frost.

The next big station is Christmas.

Everyone on the job, vacationed and keen for business.

Line up dealers on campaigns which run consistently to Christmas holiday trade.

Think in the terms of Fall and Winter.

Think also in the terms of prosperity.

You know that nothing serious is going to happen to this country this year, whoever may be elected in November.

Smart merchants are doing business "as usual."

The automobile is becoming more popular every day. If you are seeking a contest idea that is just a little different and one with a universal appeal, listen. In opening a new accessory house, the local management selected the names of six well known motor cars. The letters composing each were jumbled with results similar to this: 1. Darkcap, and 2. Danlevro, which are disguises for Packard and Overland. An attractive tenday campaign written around this funny looking list told of the five valuable prizes offered, to motor car owners only, for the most original and nearest correct list brought in person to the store. The response exceeded, by far, all expectations.—Ellis Loveless, Norfolk (Va.) Ledger-Dispatch.

A good idea is "The Mysterious Mr. Raffles" stunt conducted by a Tennessee paper. The upper half of the page was used to impart the information. A picture of "Raffles" himself adorned the center. Of course, Mr. "Raffles" back is turned to the reader. A head announced that Mr. "Raffles had arrived in the city this morning 8:55 Southern Station. A minute description is given of this man and $50 reward offered to the first person who identifies him. Besides the prizes the stores advertising announce that "Mr. Raffles" will appear in their places of business at designated hours and offer prizes to the first persons in the store who are able to identify this personage. This is a real producer and for novelty cannot be excelled.—George C. Marcley, Ogdensburg (N. Y.) Republican-Journal.

The Worcester Telegram-Gazette is publishing a full page of small advertisements, mostly of firms which otherwise seldom buy space. A somewhat new slant is given to the familiar "Ad-writing" contest by having the reader "look for the ad which is starred." Each time the page appears, one advertisement has a star in it. The reader has to look through the page to find that advertisement and in so doing reads all, a good talking point in selling the stunt. The reader who writes the best advertisement wins a prize and is featured editorially. —James M. Mosely, Boston, Mass.

When school opens in your city get advertisements not only from the downtown merchants who are anxious for school patronage but also from the stores in the neighborhoods of the various schools. In fact, a couple of pages might be devoted to ads of these neighborhood schools, with the adds of the stores around each particular school grouped under the name of that school.—Frank H. Williams, 813 South Van Ness avenue, Santa Ana, Cal.

A group of private school and college ads comprising a complete section was recently secured for openings by the Washington (D. C.) Herald, and used with reading matter furnished by some of the leading local educators.—C. M. Littlejohn, Washington, D. C.

In many cities, laundries are among the hardest of the prosperous businesses to convince of the merits of newspaper space. Laundries, however, are eager for public good will. For example, the term "mangle" has been barred from laundry parlance. The machine that wrings is now referred to as the extractor. A good piece of copy featuring this or other changes in the laundry business, that is to say, explaining modern laundering, ought to sell to some good laundry in almost any city.—T. E. Steward, 4921 Pleasant avenue, Minneapolis, Minn.

Garage men and tire dealers are prospects for some space right now before winter is here.

This is the time to buy tires and avoid tire trouble all winter long.

Prices are right now, too. So go after these prospects with this suggestion. You can get a few hundred lines out of almost every dealer if you try.—R. John Gibler, 2100 Pine street, St. Louis, Mo.

East Liverpool, O., Papers Merged

Louis H. Brush, owner of both East Liverpool papers, and the Salem (O.) News, and who is also one of the owners of the Marion (O.) Star, purchased the Tribune in 1919. HUNCHES

ONE DOLLAR WILL BE PAID FOR EACH "HUNCH" PUBLISHED

THE Boston Post is having a letter contest on "Which event in childhood taught you the most valuable lesson?" This already is drawing human interest letters.—James M. Mosey, Boston.

Romance, comedy and tragedy have all been found by the Washington (D. C.) News in articles between the pages of circulating books returned to the public library by borrowers. What messages are in such volumes in your town?—C. M. Littlejohn, Washington, D. C.

Readers of the Greensburg (Ind.) News have been getting a lot of laughs out of the Anglers' Column which appears in that newspaper as often as the fishermen tell 'em. Fishermen are always willing to talk and many good yarns result.—Yandell C. Cline, Columbus (Ind.) Republican.

"What They Saw Last Week" is the title of a novel Sunday department of the Minneapolis Journal in which "Journal readers try reporting." Anything odd, novel, tragic or comic is fit for the column, the accounts printed winning $1 for the contributor. The department is a first-class indication of what readers believe interesting and gives many hints regarding what the public will read. Some live news tips are possible through such a column.—A. C. Regli, Eau Claire, Wis.

With the approach of fall and winter, many readers are giving thought to indoor social functions, particularly dances. It has been 10 years since the World War started and much of the dance craze has been blamed on the war. Get from your city clerk the number of licensed dance halls in 1914 and the number in 1924. It might be well also to get the figures of 1918 when the war ended. A comparison of these figures, making allowance for population increases, should determine whether the jazz era is or is not on the decline in your city.—George R. Dye, Trenton (N. J.) Times.

A suggestion which has worked out well in the Providence Sunday Journal is to give a series of articles on how the papers and records of great value belonging to the cities and state are kept safe in the city halls and the State House. In some states these papers are kept in security which insures them against theft, fire and dampness. In others, the papers are left in places that are not by any means secure. How are the state and city papers kept in your state?—Russel H. Sharpe, 2 Gallatin street, Providence, R. I.

The Lebanon (Ind.) Reporter is making news gatherers out of its carrier boys. A special column appears in the paper several times each week and each carrier is given credit along with his news by a number which represents him. It keeps the boys on their toes, gives them a new interest in the paper, occasionally discloses some good stories and will in time develop reporters to fill the breaches when they are needed.—Yandell C. Cline, Columbus, (Ind.) Republican.

The Seattle Star ran a series of front page features on modern crime detection methods. The series ran for about six days and described every step in the unraveling of a modern murder mystery from the time the victim was found to the arrest of the criminal. In order to make the story vivid and concrete, readers were asked to suppose that a Star reporter had been found murdered at his desk in the Star office. The best detective in the city worked on the case and later articles described his methods in detail. The point of the series was to show how an up-to-date detective uses the same shrewd reasoning in every-day work that is commonly ascribed only to the Sherlock Holmes type of detective in popular fiction. The series was illustrated with cuts and diagrams.—Norman J. Radder.

"Who's Who in Northfield," is the content of a single column box head used above a cut of H. J. Bekert, "veteran Northfield business man." Below the cut in italics are the following questions concerning the subject, the answers given after each in regular body type: "When and where were you born? When did you come to Northfield? What induced you to come? What was the earliest event of your life you recall? What was your boyhood ambition? What is your favorite sport? If you were counselling a young man about to start out in life for himself what would be your advice? What aided you most in attaining success? What one thing does Northfield need most?" This is a good editorial page feature taking from 8 to 9 inches a week and costing little compared to the interest it draws from your readers.—Sumner J. Harris, Sturgeon Bay, Wis.

WHAT OUR READERS SAY

Advertising Newspaper Advertising

To Editor & Publisher:—May I compliment Editor & Publisher on the very constructive editorial "Missionary Work" in Editor & Publisher for Aug. 9.

If all publishers in all cities would follow the suggestion of this editorial, it would mean a tremendous and immediate increase in national newspaper advertising lineage.

Unfortunately, however, the number of publishers who will follow this suggestion will probably be measured on the fingers of one or two hands. Because each of them is so wrapt up in the success of his own undertaking that he thinks that he has very little time for missionary work. He naturally thinks first of the source of his biggest income and that is local advertising, and most of the cultivation that he does in one way or another is with the big local advertiser or the prospective local advertiser.

It has seemed to me that another suggestion (I think made by Editor & Publisher) offered the very best means of overcoming this ever present human element.

It is my recollection that in your columns I first saw the thought of a consistent and constant campaign of education to be run in all newspapers in the United States and to be run all the time. The campaign to talk about and give the reasons for the superiority of newspaper advertising for the selling of most all kinds of merchandise.

Do you not believe that every newspaper in the United States should every week receive a mat from some central organization, such as the Bureau of Advertising of the A. N. P. A.,—the mat to contain some one specific argument for newspaper advertising?

Don't you think that this is about the only way to overcome the human element?

Whereas one out of a hundred publishers would be likely to talk to the national advertiser in his own home town, or the prospective advertiser, regarding the superiority of newspaper advertising, don't you think that at least one in ten might run a good part of the mats supplied to him from some central organization, such as the Bureau of Advertising of the A. N. P. A?

It would, of course, be possible for publishers in each particular city to mark the few paragraphs regarding newspaper advertising and send such marked copies to his local, national advertiser, or prospective national advertiser.

Do you not believe that a mat service such as this would do a great deal to increase national newspaper advertising lineage in the course of a few years. And at the same time would be of tremendous benefit to many national advertisers.

CHOOSE "OHIO FIRST"

Commercially Ohio is First choice of many National Advertisers who appreciate the value of first grade territory.

Ohio is a state of great affluence, her total wealth reaching over

$18,473,316,000

Of this enormous sum, which ranks Ohio the fourth state in the Union, each one of Ohio's 5,759,394 inhabitants has a liberal share. The per capita wealth is $3045.

The wealth of a community is after all the strongest argument that can be advanced in support of profitable advertising. It is the vitally necessary thing that contributes to the advertiser's success.

Ohio, with approximately half the population of New York state, leads all other states in the Union, excepting New York, in the number of automobiles owned and operated within its borders. Ohio has 1,069,100 motor vehicles, while New York has but 1,204,213. Last year Ohio had an increase of 210,-384 or 25%, while New York's increase was 20%, or 201,920.

Ohio's wealth is distributed in all parts of the state. Cities, towns, villages, suburban and urban districts have cash at their disposal.

Use these "Ohio First" newspapers to create demand, increase demand, and sustain demand. They can and will do it in proportion to the enterprise of the advertiser.

The Most Effective

IN the rich, responsive New York market with its population of 9,400,000, The Sun is the most effective evening newspaper through which to build and increase sales for all products of good quality.

The remarkable selling power of The Sun is reflected in the large volume of advertising which both local and national advertisers place in The Sun.

During 1923 The Sun published 10,689,292 lines of advertising, which was an increase of more than a million lines over the previous year. During the first eight months of 1924 The Sun has gained one million and a half lines over the corresponding eight months of 1923.

The Sun carries more National advertising than any other evening newspaper in New York, and shows a greater gain in National advertising in the eight months of 1924 over the corresponding period last year than any other New York evening newspaper.

The Department stores of Manhattan, which depend on quick, tangible results from their advertising, use more space in The Sun than in any other New York newspaper—seven day morning as well as six day evening.

Advertisers in The Sun reach the largest number of high-class, responsive readers attained by any New York evening newspaper.

These serials and short stories, published originally as Chicago Tribune Blue Ribbon fiction, are now in book form. Although probably millions of persons have read the stories in The Tribune and in the other newspapers carrying them simultaneously, and have thus been removed from the field of readers of the books, the publishers nevertheless considered the stories worthy of the expense and effort and financial risk of publishing them in book form. We believe there can be no better indorsement of The Chicago Tribune's Blue Ribbon fiction.

Car Steps vs. Door Steps

¶ The paper that is delivered at home is read. Add a whole family to your audience.

¶ If circulation figures satisfy you, the Sunpapers can speak convincingly and impressively on a strictly mathematical basis.

¶ It's when you go deeper than the adding machine can reach that you begin to realize the importance of the Sunpapers in the life of Baltimore.

¶ Sunpaper circulation is not of the car-step, "gimme a paper" variety. The great stream of Sunpapers which runs from the presses mornings, evenings and Sundays flows through well-established channels directly into the homes of Baltimore.

¶ "Carrier distribution" by an organization of real business men provides these channels and insures both the stability and natural growth of Sunpaper circulation.

Philadelphia

Philadelphia's payroll of its manufacturing plants exceeds $7,572,704 weekly.

Not to speak of the bank and trust company clearances of $2,181,000,000 during the month of July.

Philadelphia is different from most any other market in America because its citizens usually have regular employment; more than half of the 500,000 homes in the city and suburbs are owned by their occupants.

Philadelphia's families are large consumers of food products, toilet articles, household devices and utilities, while their outlays for clothing and home furnishings are enormous.

Concentrating on the Philadelphia market is well worth the while of any advertiser who wants to get his machinery or materials into its factories, his merchandise into its stores, his goods into its homes.

Newspaper Lineage Tops Two Billions Indicating a Bumper Year

1923 Figures Surpassed in First 6 Months' Totals Compiled by Editor & Publisher—Records of 870 Dailies in 457 Cities Tabulated, 175 Morning, 494 Evening and 201 Sunday—"Presidential Year" Bogey a Dud

TWO billion, ninety million, eight hundred ninety-four thousand, three hundred and nine agate lines of advertising appeared in 870 daily and Sunday newspapers in 457 cities of the United States during the first six months of 1924. That is the net, the essence, of the result from labors which have extended over several weeks and have involved days of addition and calculation from the returns made by individual newspaper publishers.

This compilation, the fourth of its kind in two years by EDITOR & PUBLISHER, is the most comprehensive and complete collection of newspaper advertising statistics ever made, and the total lineage is, of course, the largest ever noted. It is a stupendous total, and it need not be emphasized that it is all but incomprehensive stated in numerals.

Were it to be represented graphically as a belt composed of agate lines, two inches wide, laid end to end, its 65,000 miles would trace the westerly course of the globe-circling aviators three times from Los Angeles to New York.

And if the agate lines were moved from line into column, 14 to an inch, the rear would just have left Los Angeles as the van was entering New York.

So much has been measured of this magic wand which business waves, and the greater part of it has not met the statistician's eye.

These numbers, gigantic as they were, measure only the advertising that appeared in 175 morning newspapers, 494 evening newspapers, and 201 Sunday newspapers in United States cities.

These 457 cities are the homes of 40,465,000 people, or about 38 per cent of the population under the 1920 census.

Morning newspapers whose figures appear in the following tables are 41 per cent of the total number of morning papers published.

Evening newspapers listed form 31 per cent of all the evening papers published.

Sunday newspapers whose figures swell the totals are 38 per cent of their group.

True, all the metropolitan names are listed, with their great circulations. So are many newspapers which make their publishers a humble living in towns and villages of 5,000 people, with circulations barely topping four figures. But as circulation has no demonstrable relation to advertising volume, it needs no further mention. The fact stands out that this figure of more than two billion lines was reached by less than 40 per cent of the press which serves the nation.

What, then, can be said of the unmeasured 60 per cent, with the available 1924 statistics and the findings of previous years as guide?

Just this, without the possibility of challenge:

Advertisers are spending as much money—probably more—in newspapers this year as they spent in 1923.

There's a cheerful thought for the fall. Presidential campaign, cold and rainy spring, Washington investigation, panicky politicians, smoking-car babble of "business is rotten"—the Gloomy Gus of Advertising Row has a hundred more alibis to mask his ignorance all combined; have failed to stop advertisers from using newspapers to sell goods.

Last February EDITOR & PUBLISHER estimated the amount spent for all kinds of newspaper advertising in 1923 at $628,000,000. The rule by which this figure was reached is not yet mathematically proved, but it has been used in past years with results that are substantiated by federal and industrial estimates of newspaper revenues.

This year, on the basis of the half-year's figures available, EDITOR & PUBLISHER estimates the advertising income of newspapers will approximate $635,000,000.

July and August have been dull enough to blunt the edge of the second half-year's lineage, which ordinarily exceeds that of the first six months by 10 per cent. September has seen a remarkable acceleration of business, in the east, at any rate, and it is in the east and middle west that the bulk of the lineage records are compiled. The Pacific Coast is still represented among the leaders, even though business west of the Rockies is not up to its record-breaking achievements of 1919-1923.

That statement leads to a generalization which might be drawn from the detailed statistics — lineage records have been "spotty" in 1924. Newspapers with new high records are located in all parts of the country, side by side with those which fell short of their 1923 marks. The general gains which were noted this time a year ago are not characteristic of the January-June, 1924, figures.

Many newspapers show handsome gains in national advertising, while falling behind their 1923 figures in local display and classified. With many others, the local display has passed the previous level, while national lags behind. In general, it may be said that classified advertising was not so heavy during the first six months of 1924 as in the same period of 1923, due largely to slackening in the real estate market and to a drop in help-wanted copy.

Taking the total for the United States—2,090,894,309 agate lines—and scanning its subdivisions, it is seen that national advertising's 354,812,000 lines make up 16.9 per cent of all the lineage. A year ago its proportion was 18 per cent.

Local display advertising, with 1,349,337,000 agate lines, composed 64.5 per cent of the total, against 61 per cent last year.

Classified advertising, with 306,600,000 agate lines, was 14.6 per cent of the total, against 15 per cent last year.

These proportions obviously do not hold when daily papers are divided into morning and evening groups.

Morning papers made up their total of 659,132,776 agate lines like this:

National—116,299,250 lines, or 17.6 per cent. Last year it was 20 per cent.

Local—391,890,097 lines, or 59.4 per cent. Last year it was 60 per cent.

Classified—110,710,262 lines, or 19.1 per cent. Last year it was 18 per cent.

In the evening field, the total of 1,431,761,533 lines is divided as follows:

National—238,513,305 lines, or 16.6 per cent. It was 15 per cent in 1923.

Local—957,447,810 lines, or 66.9 per cent. It was 63 per cent last year.

Classified—186,557,150 lines, or 13 per cent. Last year it was 12 per cent.

(*Total includes readers and legal, lineage unstated)

None of these percentage groups totals 100 per cent, because publishers have other classifications for a small part of their advertising—legal, office, and miscellaneous, which may run from 1 to 10 per cent in some offices. A few newspapers remain which keep no records of classified advertising except the cash in the drawer, but it will be noted that these are fewer than they were two years ago, when the first lineage tabulation was published. Less than half a dozen newspapers of those listed cling to the antediluvian practice of lumping their local and national display lineage in one total. The keeping of newspaper records has improved remarkably since August, 1922, it may be said in passing.

In one major respect only is this table lacking in essential detailed information. Lineage carried by Sunday papers is not yet separated from the daily editions by many newspapers, even in the large cities and it is impossible to form any accurate judgment as to the proportion of Sunday business to the whole.

The best estimate from available figures is that it approximates 30 per cent on the average leading seven-day newspaper, though in a few cases the Sunday business is more than 50 per cent of the total.

Sunday lineage is an unimportant factor in Canadian lineage, which is computed for 13 morning, and 33 evening papers in 34 cities of the Dominion. Population of these cities is 2,399,116, or 27 per cent of the 1921 Census population.

Total lineage of these newspapers for the six months was 131,145,175 agate lines, of which 35,900,932 appeared in morning papers and 95,244,433 in evening papers.

Taking the daily papers as a whole, their combined lineage of 131,145,475 agate lines took volume from these branches:

National—38,345,291 agate lines, or 29.2 per cent.

Local—70,643,043 agate lines, or 53.9 per cent.

Classified—18,829,901 agate lines, or 14.3 per cent.

National advertising in Canadian morning newspapers totalled 12,036,582 lines, or 33.5 per cent of these papers' volume.

Local display advertising gave the Canadian morning papers 18,247,176 lines, or 51.4 per cent of their total.

Classified advertising, with 5,250,533 agate lines, was 14.6 per cent of the entire morning paper lineage.

In Canadian evening papers, national business ran 26,308,709 lines or 27.6 per cent.

Local advertising totalled 52,405,867 lines, or 55 per cent.

Classified advertising, with 13,579,368 lines, accounted for 14.1 per cent.

There are the grand totals and the rough castings that can safely be made from them. One can carry out for pages a list of "firsts" under various heads to the glory of the great newspapers which recorded them, but the table which starts on this page makes it unnecessary. The Baltimore Sunpapers again lead all entries by combining their morning, evening and Sunday totals, and the Detroit News is again seen in the place it knows well from past years as leader of all papers except the double-header of Baltimore.

The Los Angeles Times cedes the palm of topping the list which it has held for several seasons, but it remains unchallenged as the leader of the morning and Sunday group. That is as far as this writer intends to carry the pointed.

Publishers who found something to crow about in their first half-year's accomplishments in several cases put their triumphant call into the advertising columns, where they can be set forth at length.

What is worth repeating and what EDITOR & PUBLISHER will continue to repeat on the foundation of this table is that

BUSINESS IS GOOD!

FACTS LINEAGE REPORTS REVEAL

FEATURES of this fourth semi-annual tabulation of newspaper lineage are:

457 U. S. cities listed include 38 per cent of the 1920 census total population.

Newspapers listed—175 morning, 494 evening and 201 Sunday—comprise about 35 per cent of the daily press.

Their advertising volume during the first six months of 1924 exceeded 2,000,000,000 agate lines.

Estimates based on this showing place the 1924 advertising revenue of newspapers at $635,000,000.

NEW EVENING TABLOID SCHEDULED TO APPEAR IN NEWARK SEPT. 15

Newark Press Will Print Sunday Edition—Joseph J. Fiske President, M. E. Zepp Business Manager, and L. A. McMahon Editor—Equipment Ready

AFTER many earlier announcements and delays, a new daily newspaper will be published in Newark, N. J., Sept. 15, the Newark Press, an afternoon and Sunday morning tabloid.

J. J. FISKE

Officials of the Press Publishing Corporation, organized to publish the new newspaper, are Joseph J. Fiske, president; Maynard E. Zepp, business manager; and George D. Smith, treasurer.

As scheduled to appear next Monday, the Press will run 28 or 32 tabloid pages, "highly picturized," using International New Service and Newspaper Enterprise Association features, with a 4-page, 4-color, Sunday comic section.

Louis A. MacMahon, formerly assistant director of advertising and general promotion manager of the Washington (D. C.) Times, has been appointed editor.

A long-term lease on the Press Building, 27, 29, 31, 33 Treat Place, has been signed by the corporation. Work of converting the three-story brick building — garage on the first floor, billposting plant on the second and sign painting shop on the third—is practically complete.

M. E. ZEPP

The Press has installed all of the mechanical equipment of the Utica Globe and Telegram. The equipment includes a quad, hard-pack four-color Hoe press.

A complete, new engraving plant and a photographic department also have been installed.

The personnel of the Press will consist of 125 men and women, practically all of them residents of Newark, who are conversant with the handling of news and advertising in their own city.

Fiske got his first newspaper experience with the Cleveland News in 1907 and 1908 after publishing a weekly newspaper in Cleveland. He temporarily left the newspaper field to become advertising and sales manager of the Cleveland-Akron Sign Company.

After 4 years service with that company, he became advertising promotion director of the Cleveland Press. During 1915 and 1916 he made surveys for a number of dailies and directed the sales and advertising department of the Montreal Gazette.

L. A. MACMAHON

Leaving the Gazette, Mr. Fiske went to Newark as promotional manager of the Star-Eagle and later became director of advertising.

Maynard E. Zepp, business manager, has served on important newspapers throughout the country for the past 21 years. He first attracted attention as circulation director in Indianapolis, later going to Toronto and Montreal, Canada, and then with the Munsey organization in Boston. A few years after he went to Washington, D. C., where he served in the Munsey and Hearst organization in a business capacity and in 1922 he became business manager of the Washington News, the Scripps-Howard tabloid. Later he went to Baltimore and superintended the installation of the Baltimore Post, another Scripps-Howard tabloid.

MacMahon has had a varied newspaper experience covering 26 years. In 1898 he entered the employ of the Washington Times, then owned by Stilson Hutchins. Remaining in Washington until 1910, MacMahon went to Richmond Va., to help establish the Virginian.

Returning to Washington, D. C., in 1915, MacMahon published several special editions for the Washington Times and in 1916 was detailed as war correspondent on the Mexican border.

Upon conclusion of his war work, MacMahon became Eastern director of publicity for Gen. Leonard Wood's campaign for the Republican nomination for president in 1920.

The Press will be "Republican in national politics and independent in local politics."

Payne, Burns & Smith will represent The Press in the national advertising field in the East, while the G. Logan Payne Company will be the Western advertising representative.

HARD COAL OPERATORS IN UNIQUE CAMPAIGN

Seek to Educate Public to Use Smaller Sizes—Newspaper Space Tied Up With Local Exhibits—To Run Throughout Winter

An important development of the week in national advertising has been a campaign begun by the Anthracite Coal Operators of Pennsylvania, the object of which is to educate the public in matters of fuel economy.

An unusual and interest-compelling newspaper campaign, with copy designs in 300, 500 and 900 line layouts, is being placed by the Theodore E. Ash Agency, Commercial Trust Building, Philadelphia, to tie up with the educational plans in specified cities.

The campaign consists of five permanent service stations, each in New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Boston and Washington, where, for the first time in the history of the industry coal consumers may go for definite information on the proper methods of heating a home. These permanent clearing houses of information are known as Anthracite Economy Service.

A second step in the operators' campaign of public enlightenment is a traveling exhibit, known as The Anthracite Economy Service Exhibit, with the same purpose as its keynote. It will be shown in 20 cities, a week in each. It started at Portland, Me., the first week in September. It is now proceeding to the following cities in the order named, showing a week in each place: Manchester, N. H., Providence, R. I., Worcester and Springfield, Mass., Hartford, New Haven and Bridgeport, Conn., Albany, Syracuse, Rochester and Buffalo, N. Y., Paterson, Newark and Trenton, N. J., Allentown and Lancaster, Pa., Baltimore, Md., Wilmington, Del., and Atlantic City, N. J.

Past efforts to educate the public in the wider use of the smaller sizes of anthracite, particularly buckwheat, is being extended and stressed. Housewives are being urged to inspect the devices used for burning the cheaper sizes of coal. Dealer and appliance manufacturers are co-operating with the coal operators and the campaign will run throughout the winter.

The first step was the opening of the five permanent information bureaus, each one showing complete installation of standard devices for the use of buckwheat coal. The personnel of the demonstrating force retained by the operators comprises men equipped by experience to prove the economy and efficiency of both the coal and the appliances. These experts are in constant attendance.

The unique traveling exhibit like the permanent Service Stations is being given plenty of publicity and with the dealers co-ordinating it is making a direct appeal to the great body of consumers. The extension of the use of buckwheat in the smaller size home is the objective directly aimed at.

Nothing is sold at either the permanent or traveling Anthracite Economy Service Exhibits, their purpose being educational. The service is free. Every effort is made to get consumers of coal to visit these Services and benefit therefrom.

DAILY HAS POWERFUL RADIO

Montreal La Presse Programs Heard in All Sections of U. S.

The Montreal La Presse operating a 2 kilowatt broadcaster, has received letters from almost every city in the United States acknowledging receipt of its radio service, according to H. A. Roberts, business and advertising manager of La Presse. The newspaper is now installing a new transmitter with 7½ kilowatt power and expects to be heard throughout Europe. La Presse's new station will be one of the most powerful transmitting stations in existence.

La Presse has issued an invitation to newspaper men visiting Montreal to inspect the La Presse radio station which operates under the letters "CKAC."

COVERING WORLD FLIERS IN BLEAK NORTHLAND

Adventures of Staff Men Sent to Meet Globe Circlers at Iceland—How News Was Flashed to Civilization—Feats in American Newspaper Enterprise

By OTIS PEABODY SWIFT

Written for EDITOR & PUBLISHER

EDITOR'S NOTE: Thousands of newspapermen, speaking through interpreters in a dozen languages, playing the game by arctic glaciers and under tropic palms, covered the U. S. Army 'Round the World Flight when the airmen reached their zones—from Santa Monica to Singapore, from Banda Abbas to Boston.

One particular group of American newspapermen, stationed aboard the U. S. S. Richmond, covered the last stages of the flight from the Orkney Islands across the North Atlantic. In the following article Mr. Swift, who handled the story for the United Press and United News, tells the professional newspaper story of the flight, showing how it was covered and discussing transmission and other news problems involved.

U. S. S. RICHMOND, AT SEA, ENROUTE HOME.—The day by day progress of the U. S. Army 'Round the World fliers has, we hope, filtered into your offices from time to time, coming under fantastic sub-arctic date-lines. Possibly some of you have wondered how the story was being handled at this end. The following story is to explain the mechanics of the stunt.

From Houton Bay, Orkney Islands, to Boston the story was handled by two groups of newspaper men. The party of which I am a member has been stationed aboard the U. S. S. Richmond, light cruiser and flag-ship of Admiral Magruder, U. S. N. who commanded the three cruisers and seven destroyers guarding various parts of the trans-Atlantic flight. A second group of newspapermen, who came north on destroyers, picked up the flight at Indian harboor, Labrador.

It was a dark and stormy night, July 21, when a navy motor sailer pulled out from the beach at Newport, R. I., and landed 6 newspaper men and camera men aboard the Richmond, lying at anchor off Jamestown, R. I. We stood on the windy quarter-deck, surrounded by baggage and Coronas, and looked each other over.

There was W. E. Playfair of the Associated Press, Boston Bureau; Damon Runyon of the Universal Service; F. R. Neely, aviation expert of the Washington Star, whose articles were also to go to the North American Newspaper Alliance, and myself, representing the United Press and United News. Guarding their cameras stood U. K. Whipple of the International Newsreel and R. E. Donahue of the Pathe News.

From the first Admiral Magruder, his staff, Captain Cotten of the Richmond and the ship's officers extended every courtesy and facility to the newspaper group.

We sailed at dawn. The Richmond made a calm 7-day run to Scotland. She refueled under the Firth Bridge, while the newspapermen explored Edinburgh, six miles away. An overnight run brought us to Houton Bay, Scapa Flow, where we were due to meet the fliers, who were then at Brough, near Hull.

Davis Walsh of the International News Service and Don Skene of the Chicago Tribune Foreign News Service had joined the Richmond at Rosyth. When the ship anchored in lonely Scapa Flow a tiny shore boat, panted out to us. Tweed clad figures waved.

There was Arthur Mann of the New York World, Thomas Ryan of the Chicago Tribune and J. E. Atchinson of the Associated Press, all London bureau men had come up solely for the Houton Bay show. They returned to London after we left. They had already camped 10 weary days in the quaint old world town of Kirkwall.

The fliers were momentarily expected. We were in the war-zone at last. The alleged fun began.

All organizations have arranged with the navy department for their representatives to send ad lib both full rate and press—the accounting to take place later. There were now 6 writers, all anxious to write. There was one radio set, busy most of the time with official dispatches. When there was nothing else to do the radio could handle 800 words of press an hour.

The Admiral's staff solved the problem. It was decreed that when big news broke every man was entitled to send one 20-word "flash," full rate, which would go as soon as possible. When official business was cleared up each man was entitled to file as much as he wanted, but in 200 word takes. Flashes went in rotation, the turns being drawn for the first day, and being automatic thereafter, each man going down one number on each flash. The takes went in rotation also, the order being based on time of filing of your first take. When your first take had gone you would have to wait for the first takes of the others, 1,000 words in all, before your second take went.

The system made for condensation. You recall the first news developments. Wade and Ogden fell in a stormy sea. They were lost. Destroyers and warships rushed to the rescue. They were found! A trawler had them! A destroyer took them from the trawler. The Richmond took them from the destroyer! Wireless messages swept over the desolate seas. The 'plane was damaged when a boom broke attempting to hoist it on the Richmond. The plane was being towed. It sank at dawn.

Naturally, while all this row was going on, there was absolutely no chance of the radio handling any press. The radio was busy with urgent official queries, ship to ship, the grave business of search, rescue, disaster.

The story broke at 9 A. M. At 9:15 every correspondent had filed 400 words or so. As the Richmond steamed madly on the search, every correspondent filed more. Not a word moved. At 8 P. M. when the whole day was done, when each newspaperman had witnessed, before his eyes, a ruthless tragedy of the sea, freighted with every element of romance, word came that each man could get two twenty word flashes off.

Tell the story in 40 words.

Well, they did.

Then the radio shack announced that it could begin moving 200 word takes. Those glowing stories, written in the exciting forenoon and filed against the opening of the wire, were stone cold in view of subsequent events. Every correspondent gritted his teeth and retold the yarn in 200 terse words.

But we have run ahead of the story. The milder episodes of Houton Bay gave their own transmission difficulties. When a story broke there one filed it in the ship's radio shack, and prayed that it would move. Then one hastened ashore—the shore boats ran every hour—hired a 1910 model car from among the two or three that waited beside the one house on the beach, and rushed 10 miles across country to put the same story onto the telegraph line to London.

I shall not forget one flash. We all filed it from the ship. We hastened ashore. Beside the one house at Houton Bay stood three vehicles. One wire service commandeered an ancient motor cycle side car; one hired a decrepit Ford, one, a trifle slow, was forced to take a 1912 model Stoddard-Dayton. Over the narrow winding road that crawled across the grey-green treeless hills, past the thatched roof stone houses, beside the peat bogs, above the sea cliffs—10 long miles to Kirkwall and a telegraph station—raced the American newspapermen, at 15 miles an hour, fighting to reach the fickle wire first.

On this sort of a story, of course, the American staff correspondent usually has the assistance of his organization's part time local man. In Kirkwall I worked with Editor Leonard of the Kirkwall Herald, as keen and energetic a newspaper man as one would meet at home, although his domain is the lonely Orkney group—"where 50 per cent of the Islands are uninhabited." His paper came out once a week. It was a new venture with him. Going had been hard at first; but the paper was paying well now. He talked of the paper eagerly, and one realized that all the brave hearted country editors of the world are kin.

The episodes of Houten Bay were ended. The Wade story had gone—into the night air. Dawn, and a grey-brown coast, volcanic cliffs, towering snow-capped mountains, rose on the horizon. That coast was Iceland. It was blowing a 60-mile gale. Our radio had told us that Smith and Nelson were somewhere aloft in that gale, fighting their way from Hornafjord to Reykjavik. We steamed into a little harbor: a red roofed fishing village sprawled along the shore. It was Reykjavik. Black dots appeared on the horizon. The 'planes swept over us; landed. We wrote hurried stories and filed them, just for luck, with the wireless.

The big job was to get ashore and send from the shore cable. We had all wirelessed our home offices in advance to arrange for us to send collect over the Great Northern Cable which terminated there. We filed to our London offices which relayed the stories to New York. How does a foreign correspondent make himself acquainted with a strange foreign town? As follows:

My organization's native correspondent at Reykjavik had died, probably in despair at never getting any news. We lacked a man there. There was no one to arrange the ground work for me.

The first motor sailer came into the beach, loaded with correspondents who were loaded with copy. Each correspondent was determined to reach the wire first. None of us spoke Icelandic. Where was the cable station?

A crowd of 500 Icelanders waited on the stone quay. I scanned them when the motor sailer was 15 feet off the landing stage. Inside the police lines I saw several keen faced men, copy paper sticking from their coat pockets. I selected one who seemed the leader. I shouted at him in French.

"I am an American journalist. Where is the cable station?"

The boat pulled in against the quay; waves dashed; sailors shouted.

"I shall direct you!" the Icelander cried in perfect English.

He grabbed my hand, pulled me ashore. We shoved through the crowd without a word, hurried a block up a picturesque street, ducked into a dark doorway with the cheers of the crowd ringing behind us, and stopped at a cable desk.

He was the editor of a local newspaper, a man who knew New York, London and Paris. Gentlemen, meet Baldur Sveinnson,

SPRINGFIELD REPUBLICAN CELEBRATES A CENTURY OF PROUD TRADITION

One Hundredth Anniversary Marked by Banquet and Reception—Many Noted "Alumni" Return—History of Daily Reviewed

(Special to EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

SPRINGFIELD, MASS., Sept. 8.—On the 8th of September, 1824, the first issue of the Springfield Republican was published as a weekly by Samuel Bowles, the first of three editors of that name, who brought his printing press up the Connecticut river from Hartford.

SAMUEL BOWLES

Today, 100 years later, the newspaper, never having been out of the control of the Bowles family and never having relinquished one particle of the conscience or independence which marked the stewardship of Samuel Bowles 2d, or Samuel Bowles 3d, who died in 1915, held a remarkable reunion in celebration of the anniversary.

Scores of the Republican's alumni of various vintages, from Dr. Talcott Williams, who joined the staff 45 years ago, down to the younger men who in recent years have carried the Republican tradition into newspaper offices in the East and Middle West, came back for the occasion.

The chief feature of the day's celebration was the dinner at the Hotel Kimball at which more than 350 persons were present. These include "alumni" and their wives, such members of the active staff as could be spared from the publication of the morning paper, numerous present and former correspondents and a few special guests.

SAMUEL BOWLES, JR.

The chief speakers at the dinner were Frederick H. Gillett, speaker of the House of Representatives, a lifelong friend of the late Samuel Bowles and the Republican; Rear-Admiral Francis T. Bowles, representing the family and the owners; Ernest Howard, formerly editorial writer for the Republican and now a member of the New York World staff, and Waldo L. Cook, the present editor of the Republican. Frederick W. Main, chairman of the reunion committee, also spoke as an "alumnus," and read a letter from Solomon Bulkley Griffin, formerly for many years managing editor of the Republican, which was one of the interesting features of the evening. Mr. Griffin is now absent from the city. Richard Hooker, president of the Republican company presided.

Earlier in the day the alumni and their wives, to the number of 60 or more, were entertained at luncheon at the Springfield Country Club and in the afternon their was a reception at the home of Sherman H. Bowles, general manager of the Republican, on Crescent Hill, to the alumni and to citizens, friends of the Bowles family and of the newspaper men and women attended.

The dinner speaking was of great interest to the company. A warm tribute was paid to the firmness of purpose of the Bowles family in preserving their heritage untainted and among all present there was manifest a pride in having been connected with such an institution, which gives promise of maintaining its tradition unchanged.

Admiral Bowles spoke humorously about his family, but at times seriously, too. He concluded as follows:

"One word about the family. We may have disagreements but we have been loyal to the S. R., steadfast on the free list, and intensely loyal to each other.

"We have always had a leader and have one now (Sherman H. Bowles), astute as his forbears perilously industrious and just as expansive in conversation as the man from Plymouth, Vt.

"My memory of our affairs extends back to my grandmother, a not unimportant factor in the founding and the record of the Republican, for she bore and brought up two sons and two daughters, boarded two printer's apprentices then the whole mechanical force, and survived my grandfather.

"It is through her interest and my father's labor that I have a place in the ranks of that army of striving men and women who made the Republican and whose high thinking, conscientious leaders have always maintained and now preserve the single standard of service."

Admiral Bowles worked as a newsboy for the Republican and 45 years later became a director of The Republican Company.

Speaker Gillett was the next on the list. He spoke of his lifelong friendship for the late Samuel Bowles and of the friendship of his father for Samuel Bowles 2d.

Mr. Gillett also spoke warmly of Solomon Buckley Griffin, formerly managing editor of the Republican, and a letter from Mr. Griffin was read by Mr. Main, chairman of the reunion committee, in which he spoke of numerous former associates on the Republican.

"Looking afield, few indeed are living who shared in what has always seemed to me to have been the golden age of American journalism," Mr. Griffin wrote. "Herbert L. Bridgeman of the Brooklyn Standard Union, oldest living graduate from the Republican office, remains a beloved figure. Happily, too, there is Dr. Talcott Williams, with his rich newspaper experience, who has molded the school of journalism at Columbia into leadership of its field. Out of the brilliant group of New York Sun men are spared Edward Page Mitchell, incomparable editorial writer, and Boss Chester S. Lord, master of the technic which made Charles A. Dana's paper and the Republican distinctive in a former time.

"In Boston George F. Babbitt, Arthur A. Fowle and R. L. Bridgman survive. In the western part of Massachusetts, only Mr. Hill of the early '70 group is still at work on the Athol Transcript. In Connecticut, yet in the ring and going strong, are those loyal friends, Charles Hopkins Clark of the Hartford Courant and Col. Nat Osborne of the New Haven Journal-Courier, both of whom should be busy, while yet there is time in writing their reminiscences, as Mitchell and Lord have been."

RICHARD HOOKER

Ernest Howard of the New York World next spoke. After reminiscences of the old days and the "huckleberry route," of the late Samuel Bowles he said:

"It must be said that if the Republican had before obtained a national reputation as an independent paper the younger Bowles strove unceasingly to make it more independent. I don't believe that the idea of a newspaper as a purely commercial proposition ever entered his head except as something to be thrown out neck and heels."

Waldo L. Cook, the last formal speaker, representing the editorial staff, said in part:

"It is not phenomenal for a newspaper to reach the age of 100 years. What is remarkable and even exceptional is for the ownership and control to remain virtually unchanged for so long a period. Our celebration is especially an appreciation of the enduring newspaper tradition which the owners of this journal built up and maintained generation after generation. Their achievement has been unprecedented in that they created in a small town a newspaper of national influence and maintained it against endless handicaps of a formidable character—handicaps steadily growing the more formidable with the passage of time."

A few other brief speeches were made by alumni. Other features of the dinner were a silent toast to the late Samuel Bowles and vigorous cheers for Mr. Cook, the present editor, and Mr. Hooker, president of the company, a grandson of Samuel Bowles 2d.

"Flowers for the Living"

Booth Tarkington, William Allen White, Arthur Krock, Ring Lardner, E. B. Garnett, Samuel G. Blythe, and others will contribute articles for "Flowers for the Living," a new feature originated by George Ade for the Bell Syndicate.

IT HAPPENED AGAIN!

ONCE more a man bites a dog. Recently Private James Cox, a Derbyshire soldier, bit off a terrier's tail instead of docking it in the ordinary way. He appeared before court and was bound over to keep the peace.

London newspapers buried the item, apparently not according with the great American dictum as to what constitutes news.

Guy Innes, London correspondent of the Melbourne (Australia) Herald, was brought up on the precept that if a man bit a dog, it certainly was NEWS.

Training told in the case of Innes. He thought the story worth cabling to Australia, and did so.

Australia demonstrated it agreed with America and the Melbourne Herald gave it top column position on page 1, in a box, with special type.

"Now what do you think of that?" writes Innes to the EDITOR & PUBLISHER.

GRUENING WITH LA FOLLETTE

Former M. E. New York Tribune Directing Third Party Publicity

Ernest Gruening, one-time managing editor of the New York Tribune, has been named director of publicity of the La Follette-Wheeler campaign.

Dr. Gruening was born in New York 37 years ago. He is a graduate of Harvard of the class of 1907, and of the Harvard Medical School of the class of 1912. He rose from a reporter on the Boston American in 1911 to assistant editor of the Boston Herald from 1912 to 1914.

In 1914 he was made managing editor of the Boston Traveler and held that position until 1918, when he came to New York in the same capacity with the New York Tribune. In 1918 Dr. Gruening ceased to be managing editor of the Tribune after his name had been mentioned with that of Dr. Edward A. Rumely, formerly of the Mail, during the Government's investigation of the purchase of that paper by the German Government.

Harold Harper, Assistant United States District Attorney, who conducted the investigation, completely exonerated Dr. Gruening of any connection with the affair. Soon after Dr. Gruening brought suit against the Tribune for $32,580, alleging breach of contract. During the war he enlisted in the Field Artillery and was a candidate for commission when the armistice was signed. He also assisted in the organization of the Bureau of Imports and the War Trade Board at Washington, just before his enlistment.

NEWSPAPER FLEXIBILITY WINS NEW LAURELS

Citrus Growers of California Quickly Turn to Daily Medium When Mother Nature Decrees Small Sized Fruit—Education for 120,000,000 Consumers the Problem

Specially Contributed to EDITOR & PUBLISHER

THE advertising of a perishable and variable food crop presents many problems unknown to producers in other fields. Not the least of these is the problem of laying out a campaign for a product, which is manufactured in Nature's factory and on which the producer cannot place specifications as to size and quality desired. He takes what he gets, and Mother Nature being "feminine" and variable, he has no way of knowing beforehand just what he is going to get.

When the California citrus growers found themselves confronted with the problem of selling a large crop of oranges of small sizes this season, they turned to newspaper advertising as a solution of their difficulty. Such is the story that comes from the California Fruit Growers' Exchange, a co-operative marketing organization of 11,000 citrus growers who handle the nationally famous "Sunkist" oranges and lemons.

Newspaper advertising has a flexibility that makes it exceedingly valuable in dealing with the problems of a horticultural industry. Or so it would seem, from the experience of these growers.

In the case of the California orange grower, for instance, he may look over his grove in the spring, when the young fruit is setting, and decide that the chances are favorable for a large crop of fruit and that this fruit will probably be of medium sizes, popular with the consumer. Mother Nature, however, may have other ideas on the subject and send along a hot spell that drops this young fruit in a most wasteful manner and leaves the grower a small crop of oranges, which is likely to run to extremely large sizes.

Or, she may send a dry fall season when the fruit is storing up its golden juice, and complicate matters by making a large percentage of his oranges small sizes, difficult to sell. Furthermore, she may give the grower a small crop of large sizes one year and the next season furnish him with a very large crop of small size fruit, just after he has educated his trade to demand large sizes.

During the past season, Mother Nature decided that she would give the California citrus grower a large crop of small sizes, so that the latter was confronted with the necessity of making the public buy small size oranges. This meant the entire replanning, at the eleventh hour, of the advertising campaign of the large growers' co-operative citrus marketing association, the California Fruit Growers' Exchange.

Small oranges in most cases are just as good in quality, just as sweet in flavor and just as full of juice for their size, as large oranges. There is no real difference in the juice of a large and a small orange, but the consumers who eat these oranges, have for many years connected a special virtue with size and have created a demand for medium and large size fruit. If the housewife, who buys the family food, but knew it, small oranges are one of her best "buys," for prices on this fruit are always more economical than on larger sizes and the fruit is equal in quality.

To educate the housewife and all the other buyers of oranges, on the goodness and quality of small size oranges, was the problem of the citrus grower. This was the message that he must get to the consumer at the earliest possible moment as the maturing orange crop became ready for market. He must sell the consumer on the idea of buying small size oranges and "buying them now."

Newspaper advertising helped in working out the problem. While the growers' organization has a schedule in national magazines, it was seen that this type of advertising could not be revamped in time to get the campaign before the reader. On the other hand, newspapers would reach the consuming public and reach it quickly, and the entire campaign could be rewritten over night to meet the existing emergency.

The newspaper campaign for the season was worked out and the copy already written, before Mother Nature brought out her little joker and changed the crop prospects. But the growers saw that the newspaper campaign was the one to use in featuring this small size situation and so at the last minute this newspaper campaign was rewritten, to feature such ideas as: "Smaller, but Delicious. Oranges were never better than right now"; "Bargains in Oranges, Delicious Smaller Sizes on Sale everywhere," with follow-up copy telling the consumer of the quality of the fruit and urging him to buy two dozen oranges this year where one had been purchased the year before.

In connection with the newspaper advertising campaign, many newspapers helped the growers by featuring news publicity stories on the small size situation. Food page editors told their readers of bargains in small size oranges, and newspaper trade supplements carried the same message to dealers, who also had to be educated in the retailing of this off-size fruit.

For the dealer, additional advertising was done in trade papers and the fruit retailer was shown how bigger sales volume on this fruit would increase his own profits. Dealers were urged to offer oranges in quantity lots, pricing the fruit by the two or three dozen lot rather than by the dozen. It was pointed out to them that with smaller sizes, each box of oranges contained more fruit and that sale by quantity would be necessary to give them rapid turnover.

Dealer Service men from the California Fruit Growers' Exchange staff called on these fruit merchants, during the navel season visiting nearly 25,000 retail stores where they arranged special sales and displays by the peck, bushel, one-half box, and other sales-increasing ideas. These dealer service men also called the retailer's attention to the newspaper advertising done in his territory and their visits were scheduled to tie-up with this advertising.

The education of 400,000 retailers and 120,000,000 consumers along a line of this sort is a long and slow process, but the season's experience has led the California citrus industry to feel that they have made progress and it has also proved the value of quick-action advertising.

A great many people learned the past season how truly delicious small size oranges can be. Tempted by the bargain idea, many consumers doubtless ate more of this fruit than usual and so formed an "orange appetite." Since none of the advertising of the season made any claim to the fact that small oranges might be better than large oranges, but only stressed the equality of this fruit in flavor and deliciousness whether large or small, a subsequent season of large sizes will find the consuming public ready to purchase large oranges, if large sizes happen to be Mother Nature's whim. And the orange appetite that this season has developed is likely to increase the consumer's interest in this fruit.

MERCHANDISING THIS SEASON'S SMALL ORANGES.

Some of the methods employed to acquaint the trade and public alike with an unusual crop situation. Above on either side are two sample newspaper insertions running in the regular Sunkist schedule advising consumers regarding the desirability of these smaller oranges. Between them is reproduced a typical trade paper advertisement. Below this is the size guide stressing the exact sizes which the trade must handle in this year's crop. These were mailed to 60,000 of the leading retailers in the United States and Canada.

The three clippings at the bottom are samples of three forms of publicity work. The wholesale and retail trade press were kept supplied with material on the crop situation. Over 15,000 newspapers with circulation running into the millions have been supplied with stories pointing out to the consumer the cheapness and desirableness of these small oranges.

SAYS PUBLISHERS SHOULD INVESTIGATE TAINTED NEWS FROM EUROPE

President Koenigsberg Returning from Abroad Declares Abuse Is Serious Problem—Condemns Agencies Supervised by Governments—"Propaganda Rules Europe"

FOLLOWING his return from a mid-Summer tour throughout Europe, M. Koenigsberg, president of International News Service & King Features Syndicate, made public an interview-statement in which he declared that "the sources of news from Europe are so contaminated with propaganda that publishers of American newspapers should address themselves promptly to this serious problem."

The statement says: "The necessity for maintaining independent observers to collect and supply American newspapers with the real news of Europe was never so manifest as it is today.

"The American newspaper publisher who relies on any association service for news from Europe should investigate and analyze closely the sources from which his American news service is derived.

"In Europe, government supervision over the facilities for telegraphic, telephone and cable communication is complete. It is obvious that statements inimical to the administration in power can be delayed, jumbled, or rejected at the pleasure of the functionaries in charge. Therefore, a European news agency, having no other motive than that of promptness, would hesitate to burden its service with such material. However, when you consider that the European news agencies either actually enjoy subventions from the government in power or other advantages even more important than cash payments, you will not find it difficult to understand why these services reflect only the political wishes of the government in office.

"As a matter of fact, there is in each country a recognized news agency the operations of which amount practically to a monopoly. This advantage of exclusiveness is arranged on a business basis. In some instances the government actually excludes competition and adds cash support.

"I was greatly pleased to find on my visit to the headquarters of International News Service correspondents in the various capitals of Europe that all of our reporters had set up excellent systems for independent gathering of the news. They are charged with the responsibility of getting the real facts of the European situation with utter disregard to the reports of European newspapers or news services.

"I talked to the leading journalists and publishers of England, Ireland, Germany, Holland, Belgium, Italy, France and Spain, and I had opportunity to observe the result of their efforts. There is an astonishing difference between European newspapers and American newspapers, accounted for largely by the wide gulf between their standards and methods of operation.

"American newspapers are the best in the world. They give readers all the news as promptly and accurately as their facilities permit. They are published for all the people. The British and continental newspapers appeal to the classes. England has several notable exceptions, and in Germany some of the newspapers are adopting American methods. But for the most part, European newspapers are still distinctly governmental, political, or personal organs, thoroughly colored with prejudice, partiality, and special class appeal.

"Propaganda rules Europe. It is accepted by newspapers from news agencies. I have observed for years this situation created by governmental control or European news service, but it was never emphasized so graphically as during my recent tour of the continent. It constitutes a vital problem to American newspaper publishers who want to print only the truth, and who have no independent observers or connection with a news-gathering organization which does not rely on European agencies for their report."

ENDOWS JOURNALISM SCHOOL

Philadelphia Man Gives $40,000 to Poor Richards in Memory of Son

HITS PHOTOPLAY FRAUD

Post Office Issues Order Against Bristol Studio, New York

Investigation of the Bristol Photoplay Studio of New York and its "scenario editor," Vernon Hoagland, has led to the issuance of a Post Office Department fraud order against the studio and Hoagland.

It is charged that Hoagland, by means of alluring advertisements had induced persons writing scenarios and photoplays to submit their productions of the Bristol Studio and pay a stipulated sum for the service of the studio in placing the scenarios with motion picture producers. The advertisements represented that Hoagland was connected with a number of the country's leading producers, whereas he had been employed merely as a stenographer for the concerns mentioned.

The New York Post Office authorities found that thousands of manuscripts had been received by the Bristol Studio in the last 3 years and that the receipts of the concern for the year of 1923 amounted to more than $50,000.

AUGUST LINEAGE LOSS IN NEW YORK LESS THAN TWO PER CENT

AUGUST advertising in Greater New York newspapers shows a slight decline—181,906 lines, or about 1.8 per cent—under the 1923 figures for the month, according to the New York Evening Post Statistical Department, though only five of the existing 15 newspapers listed suffered losses. The roster includes the Bulletin and the Mirror, which were not published a year ago, but their combined lineage hardly more than offsets that of the suspended Evening Mail. There is no offset, except the gains of the other papers, to the missing 687,606 lines of the extinct Herald. August, 1924, had five Sundays against four in August, 1923, which assisted seven of the eight papers showing gains. The comparative totals follow:

WORLD FLIERS TO HAVE PRESS AGENT'S AID

Lt. Wright to Precede Globe Circlers on Washington-Seattle Flight Arranging Interviews—How Boston Arrival was Covered

When the round the world flyers start from Washington, D. C., on their trip across the continent to Seattle, one of the pilots in the formation has before him the most difficult and spectacular press agent job ever tackled by anyone. He is Lieut. Burdett S. Wright, general publicity officer for the world flight, and will fly just ahead of Lieuts. Smith, Nelson and Wade and their mechanics all the way across the continent to Seattle, Wash.

He will have no difficulty getting publicity for his attraction. His job will be mainly to see to it that the world flyers are interviewed with a minimum of time and exertion. To this end the aviators are assembled once in every city in which they stop, and are met by the newspaper men in a general interview, after the manner of the White House and Cabinet interviews regularly given at the national capital.

To speed the delivery of the mail stories and photographs taken by representatives of the newspapers, news services and film concerns who covered the arrival of the world flyers at Boston, last Saturday, a special branch of the United States Air Mail Service was established at the Boston airport for the convenience of the newspaper men.

Following the arrival of the airmen, news stories, photos and films were dispatched to New York and the West by air mail planes piloted by Capt. Walter H. Welles and Lieut. Ronald A. Hicks.

A tent was erected which provided all the facilities of a regular branch office, and in addition a temporary developing room was put at the disposal of the photographers. The branch was in charge of G. F. Ruggles, assistant superintendent of the mails at the Boston post office.

Newspaper men and photographers were shown every courtesy by the army officials in charge of the arrival of the flyers. Two press boats were at their disposal, and numerous airplanes were reserved for photographers. Newspaper men were the first to welcome the flyers to Boston, the press boats being but a few yards away from the planes as they landed.

TAMMEN REMEMBERS STAFF

Late Denver Post Publisher Left Over $2,000,000 Estate—Half to Widow

Employes on the Denver Post were provided for in the will of Harry H. Tammen, one of the owners of the Post, who died last July. The estate was conservatively estimated at $2,000,000.

The will stipulates that employes who have been with the Post 5 years should share in the estate, the smallest bequest to an employe being $1,000 and ranging upwards to several thousands.

One half of the estate was bequeathed outright to Mr. Tammen's widow. A brother, Frank Tammen of Denver, and a sister Mrs. J. K. Clark of New York, each was given $50,000 cash and $50,000 trust funds were established for each.

Otto Floto, sporting writer and showman of Kansas City and Denver and his wife were bequeathed $25,000.

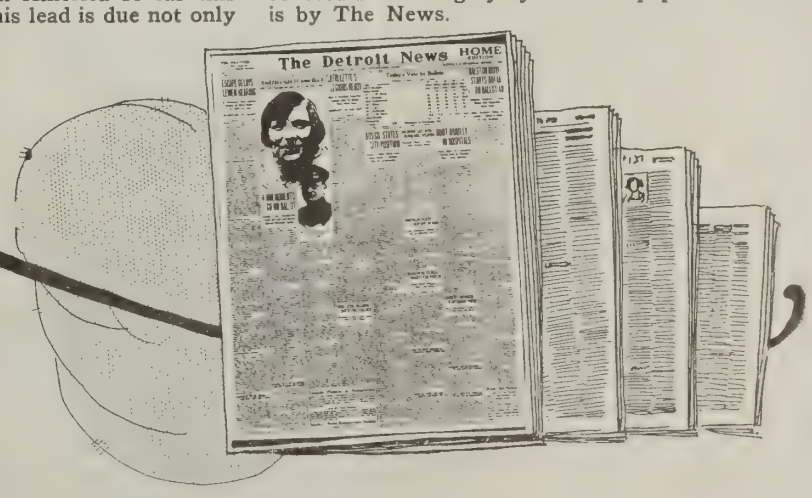
Department Stores Point The Way To Mediums That Pay

*"Figures covering department store advertising lineage provide the safest and sanest guide in the selection of newspapers which produce greatest direct results in sales * * * The local keepers of the large stores know more accurately which newspapers produce largest immediate sales than any other kind of advertiser or all other advertisers combined."*

JASON ROGERS.



Publisher of Advertisers' Weekly, former Publisher New York Globe, organizer of Bureau of Advertising of the A. N. P. A., the Audit Bureau of Circulations and author of many books on newspaper advertising.

DURING the calendar year 1923 The Detroit News led all other newspapers in the United States in total volume of Department Store advertising, according to compilation taken from figures given in the August 23, 1924, issue of "The Advertisers' Weekly." Note these figures below. The Detroit News leads its local competitors in practically every selling classification.

	Lines
Detroit News	6,341,902
Chicago News	6,102,642
Philadelphia Inquirer	5,975,860
New York World	5,822,146
New York Journal	5,413,132
St. Louis Post Dispatch	5,348,839

*This figure covers Evening and Sunday combined. Additional lineage amounting to 728,558 lines was carried in the morning editions of the New York World.

The judgment of department store advertisers in the case of The Detroit News has also been verified by practically every other advertiser who has something to sell the Detroit field. As a result, The Detroit News is first in America so far this year in total advertising. This lead is due not only to the remarkable reader interest which The News compels because of its intrinsic value as a newspaper, but also to its thorough coverage of the Detroit field. No other city of Detroit's size is covered so thoroughly by one newspaper as Detroit is by The News.

"SOUR PICKLE" GUARDS KEEP NEWS MEN FAR FROM PRINCE OF WALES

Only Four Correspondents Allowed Daily Talk with Royal Equerry at Syosset—Result: Studies in Princely Mastication a Big Newspaper Story

By FRANK GETTY

United Press Staff Correspondent
(Written Especially for EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

THE British press has found occasion to criticize the activities of American newspaper men and women assigned to cover the visit to this country of H. R. H., the Prince of Wales.

Those of us who had the misfortune, and such we came to consider it, to draw the assignment, can reply only by paraphrasing their own immortal Bruce Bairnsfather:—

"If you know of a better method, go to it."

COVER the Prince, did we say? Well, if the little dog that chases the fire engine is covering the story, then perhaps that's the right term.

Before we deny indignantly having "followed the Prince into his bath," as one London newspaper had it, let us tell exactly of what a day's work covering His Royal Highness consists.

We are at Syosset, a little crossroads village of some 500 inhabitants, about an hour's run out on Long Island. The Prince is at the estate of James A. Burden, whose wooded lands stretch many acres from the outskirts of town.

Between us and the royal personage are many guards, seemingly as many varieties of them as of the Pittsburg pickle, and some of them for our purposes, quite as sour.

There are grey guards and blue guards, secret service guards with eagle eyes and Scotland yard guards with waxed moustaches. There are liveried menials and liveried secretaries. Lastly (for this is as far as we ever get) there is the genial, uncommunicative host of equerries, aides de camp, and suite, of whom Captain Lascelles is official broadcaster.

The day begins. The gaping forms back in the press rooms are like the maws of young robins, a-hunger for news of His Highness. But, alas, be we ever so early, there is little nourishment in Syosset worms.

Until Captain Lascelles has finished breakfast, usually about 9 a. m., we may not approach the Burden estate. When he signifies his readiness, four of our number, and only four, representing the Associated Press, United Press, International News Service and Standard News may enter the grounds, under meticulous scrutiny, and talk with the equerry.

To the four of us, Captain Lascelles confides the Prince's engagements, which are purely tentative and subject to change without notice, and the fact that His Highness still sleeps, having arrived home "a bit latish."

Wales may change his mind and his plans upon arising; our informant has not seen him since the previous evening, but it is something; a reporter on this story grasps at the most fragile of straws.

In addition, Lascelles is quite ready to admit that the Prince is feeling fit and enjoying his visit. Occasionally he will deny some trivial misstatement, such as one that Wales prefers his black polo pony "Kitty" to his bay polo pony "Polly." But that is all. Thin stuff indeed for that vacant hole in the front page of the home edition.

O, yes, also His Highness would be greatly obliged if we wouldn't follow him about.

What are we to do? Most of us would hesitate to tie a string of tin cans to the tail of a thoroughbred dog, yet we cheerfully attach our hired flivvers to the dust of Wales' flashing Rolls and clatter along seeking such crumbs as may fall our way.

There is no other means of obtaining the information we are assigned to obtain, concerning this young visitor whose activities are of legitimate interest to the nation. Discarding bribery of servants, to which we once resorted, and the business of creeping under barbed wire fences, the morning conference and another similar, but less productive one in the evening are all we have to go on.

Our most pertinent questions are seldom answered.

We share what information we glean thus "officially" and debate the soundness of the daily rumors. Not a groom or chauffeur or gardener's boy within 40 miles but knows more interesting misinformation about Wales than we.

Now the men who are on the Prince of Wales story do not style thmselves journalists (at least not aloud over the wooden tables in the breakfast room at Rothman's in East Norwich) but neither are they those "boy scouts" of journalism of whom Mrs. Frank Tinney spoke so aptly a while ago.

There is O. H. P. Garrett of the World, John Stuart of the Sun, F. G. Griffin of the Toronto Star, John Winkler of the American, Frederick Edwards of the Herald Tribune, Roland Krebs, International News Service, Dudley Nichols of the Evening Post, James Duffy of the Telegram and Mail, Shannon Cormack of the Times, Harold Callender of the A. P., and the ladies, Grace Robinson of the Daily News and Lucy Doyle of the Toronto Telegram.

These men and women did not follow the Prince into his bath, but almost any one of them is about ready to, for the sight of a good story.

They realize that in lending us the heir to their throne, the British did not send us a subject of publicity such as our film actors, who, when they visit London obligingly climb cornices outside the Ritz to oblige the press.

The American newspapers put able reporters on the job; what goes into the papers is enhanced by their best ability. It is pretty thin stuff, but the fault lies less with the reporters than with the Prince, or with those about him who have seen fit to diregard the efforts of newspaper correspondents to do their work.

Most of us have felt that the proper publicity attendant upon this visit of the most interesting of Britons has been badly managed.

The idea of taking a dozen good reporters out of New York to sit about a dining table in a gloomy boarding house and divide up a handout which more often than not conveys absolutely no new information will make this clearer to newspaper men than any argument on the subject.

It is all very well to say this is a private visit. No one can be as important and at the same time as personable a young man as this sandy-haired prince who some day will wear the crown of the British Empire and not be the subject of interest to Americans.

How we writhe as we write our early afternoon newspaper leads:

"The Prince of Wales slept late again today, after not getting in until 6 a. m."

We are sure the Prince is a most delightful young person to write about. His views and personality would make good copy. Give us half a chance at them, and we will draw the veil over his bed time.

Under the present system, we must follow him about in our flivvers, scrupulously recording his nights out, his polo, and perhaps catching a glimpse of him as he is whirled off to a dinner engagement.

Perhaps this is satisfactory to the Prince. It reduces us to giving ridiculous prominence to the slightest bit of nonsense.

The Prince chews gum! Upon my word, it was the most important news item concerning His Highness one day last week.

Better relations may be established by a cordial understanding between this smiling chap who often has been styled Britain's "unofficial ambassador," and the American people.

Little is to be gained by a study of his mastication.

BRISBANE BUILDS 'EM HIGH

Editor Announces Plans for World's Tallest Apartment House

Arthur Brisbane, salesman of thought to the masses through his editorial column "Today," will build a 30-story apartment building in New York.

The structure will be carried to a height never before attained by a residential building. The architect estimates it will cost $2,500,000.

In the building will be a restaurant, bank, 358 rooms, 165 bathrooms and 135 serving pantries.

Mr. Brisbane will occupy as his city residence the 19th and 20th floors.

The architect has designed a great mast, tapering from a base 80 x 100, through a series of setbacks, to a height of 440 feet, where old Diana, of Madison Square Garden fame, will be perched on her big copper toe.

Gary (Ind.) Tribune Changes Size

Size of the Gary (Ind.) Post-Tribune was changed from 8 columns to 9 columns with the Sept. 2 issue.

Second in the Entire Country

The complete lineage report for the first six months of 1924—January to July—rates The Washington Star, with 8,617,032 lines—as SECOND among all the newspapers in the United States in local display advertising, regardless of the size of the city.

The local merchants' judgment was confirmed by 1,376,242 lines of foreign advertising during the same period—while reader recognition of the prestige of The Star is expressed in the 2,637,017 lines of classified advertising printed from January to July. A total of 12,630,291 lines.

Two things are emphasized by these figures:

The fertility of the Washington market which makes such a volume of local display advertising profitable to the merchants—

And the sufficiency of The Star alone to contact this market thoroughly.

The Evening Star.

EDITOR & PUBLISHER
1884 The Oldest Publishers' and Advertisers' Journal in America 1924

September 8, 1924

The Brooklyn Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn,
New York

Gentlemen:-

We are about to publish a complete lineage record of nearly one thousand leading papers of the United States for the six months ending July 1, 1924.

These records show that the Brooklyn Eagle is in second place of all the papers in New York City, in both total lineage and in percentage of increase over last year.

The fact that this large increase seems to be so evenly divided among all classifications, puts you in a most enviable position, and we believe that this is an opportune time for the Brooklyn Eagle to make these facts known to the national advertiser.

We suggest EDITOR & PUBLISHER as a vehicle for this announcement.

Yours very truly,

EDITOR & PUBLISHER

J B Keeney

Advertising Manager

THE NEWS carried less lineage! than any other New York newspaper

JAN. 1—AUG. 31, 1924

NOT because we couldn't get more, but because we couldn't print more in our tabloid paper . . . Only 3.53% of all the advertising run in New York newspapers in the first eight months of this year appearing in the News—3,600,546 lines of the 101,807,190 total! . . . WE KNOW of no more significant fact to national advertisers in New York . . . The three million lines in The News were delivered to the largest daily circulation in America—delivered in a small package and in an assimilable form. . . . Every advertisement in The News had its chance to sell . . . Every agate line on the small page came before the eyes of the whole News circulation . . . Every issue was an advertising salvo instead of a daily barrage. . . . GETTING copy into a paper isn't advertising necessarily, but getting copy into a reader's eyes is! . . . THE NEWS, New York's Picture Newspaper, 25 Park Place New York, 7 So. Dearborn St., Chicago.

IN the first seven months of 1924 The Cincinnati Enquirer carried 409,788 lines of passenger car display advertising.

This is more than all the other three papers in Cincinnati combined and is by 46,460 lines more than twice as much as the second best paper.

In May, June and July, The Enquirer carried 74,168 lines more than all the other three papers combined, showing a neat gain over the same period of 1923, while the second best paper established a loss of 18,326 lines.

For many years The Enquirer has led all Cincinnati papers in automobile advertising. Remember this on your fall schedules: The Enquirer alone will serve the Cincinnati territory for you.

COVERING GLOBE-CIRCLERS IN NORTHLAND

now our correspondent at Reykjavik.

The Hotel Island (Island being what the untutored Icelanders call their country) was the center of Reykjavik's social life. We really got to know the aviators there. Being Americans together, far from home, the fliers and correspondents dined regularly ensemble at a huge table loaded with raw salmon, pickled herring, blood soup with fried eggs floating in it, steak and onions and Danish pastries. Bad weather in Greenland caused interminable delays. Finally we were at sea again.

The Richmond was stationed off Angmagsalik. A three-day gale raged. The port wireless carried away. The ship rolled 40 degrees to port and 20 to starboard. The mess boys could not set tables. We heard no news, and could not have sent it had there been any. When a week later we finally put into Reykjavik, weak and wan, a message from New York waited me:

"Can't understand your silence."

I tell the story because I can also tell the story of another correspondent. During the Locatelli show we had got nothing off for some 18 hours except about 130 words apiece. Every correspondent was in frenzy over the impossibility of sending anything. At last there was a clear wire. But we could not use it. There were incoming messages that must be received. One of these was to a correspondent.

"File fully, sending everything two ways," was the burden if not the text of the home office orders.

With the Locatelli crash came three days of searching, and then the rescue. We were 100 miles off Cape Farewell, Greenland. It was 11:45 P. M. I stood in the radio shack, arguing transmission. The chief engineering officer came in the door.

"You're missing something," he said. "There's a light on the bow."

We rushed to the windy foc'sal, peered into the black night. Ahead a green rocket shot up slowly, wearily, exploded, and sank again. Again a thrilling sea drama was unrolled before our eyes, rescue by searchlights, interview, the burning of the 'plane.

By 3:00 a. m. everyone had written 1,000 words. At about 3:30 a. m. a 30-word bulletin had moved. Late the next day everyone moved another 100 words. Early the morning of the second day everyone moved 400 words more. The night of the second day after the rescue the last 500 words were moved—always in 100 word driblets, for we had now agreed to limit takes to 100 words instead of 200 so that every man would stand a better chance of moving something.

Again we steamed westward. One morning we awoke to find ourselves in a drab grey harbor, spotted with granite islands. It was Ice Tickle, Hamilton Inlet, Labrador. From the shore chugged a two masted fishing boat, manned by Labradoreans. In the bow stood a gigantic figure, a man with tanned face, blue shirt and salt whitened tweeds. It was Joseph Pierson of the Chicago Tribune.

The destroyer Lawrence, which had been lying in a nearby cove, hoisted anchor and steamed near us. We boarded her, climbing a slippery sea ladder. A burley over-coated figure stood on the deck. He was Bob Dorman of the N. E. A. and the United Press. Behind him loomed a viking type, slicker and sou'wester hiding the immaculate Forrest Davis of the New York Herald-Tribune. Below in cramped quarters of a destroyer were the rest of the "Farthest North Press Club." Veterans of this bitter coast included Francis J. Tietsort of the International News Service, Malcolm Ross of the New York World, Lemuel F. Parton of the North American Newspaper Alliance, Harold Littledale of the New York Times, William Myers of the Associated Press, Howell Cullinan of the Boston Globe, Lewis Dansee of Kinograms, Joseph Marsland of the International Newsreel, Karl Fasold of Pathe News and Ralph Morgan of Pacific and Atlantic Photos.

We began talking transmission.

They had had their own problems. Whenever news did break in Indian harbor there was next to no way of getting it out. The radios of the destroyers on duty there were far less dependable than the large sets of the Richmond. A string of coastal radio stations runs down the Labrador coast, the stations some hundred miles apart, but when one filed over this system the copy banked up at each jump.

Now they, and we with them, faced the great moment—the arrival of the airmen on the North American continent. There were about 16 men, representing almost as many organizations. Each organization expected at least a 1500 word smashing story. Had we engineered a foot race to the wire, had every man filed independently, someone would have got out a few hundred words and the others would have seen their stories dribble out for days.

The Indian Harbor correspondents had already evolved a plan. Each man was to file "B copy," or background stuff ad lib until the day the fliers arrived. On that day one story was to be written and sent simultaneously to every newspaper.

The plan worked perfectly. W. E. Playfair of the Associated Press was elected chairman of the combined groups of correspondents. Lemuel Parton of the North American Newspaper Alliance arranged the transmission angle. The joint story—1,200 words long—was written by Mr. Playfair and Don Skene of the Chicago Tribune. The one copy was filed to the N. A. N. A. offices in New York, where copies were relayed to each of the services having correspondents on the Richmond and at Indian harbor.

Every one of us had built up his background in advance. One man sent 2,200 words of this background stuff, minutely detailing just what the fliers would do on arrival. His story was perfect—had the fliers carried out their schedule. But the fliers carried out their schedule.

Indian Harbor dropped behind us. We headed south through the Straits of Belle Island. All the Indian harbor group, with the exception of Malcolm Ross of the World, had taken the destroyer Lawrence to Halifax, thence jumping to Pictou for the story there. Ross stayed on the Richmond, which put in to the Bay of Islands, Labrador, to refuel. While there we flashed the story of the Ice Tickle-Hawkes Bay jump, obtaining the news from official radios sent to the Richmond by the station ships along the route.

The Hawkes Bay-Pictou jump was similarly covered from the Richmond, which took position off Cape George, Nova Scotia, during this leg of the flight. But we had serious competition at last. Yankee newspapermen, with leased wires, were waiting at Pictou. They got the story first.

A two-day run down Nova Scotia and across the Gulf of Maine brought the explorers to Boston.

But our job was not done. Most of us rushed out to the Boston Airport to welcome the fliers there. The Indian Harbor men, who had dashed ahead by train from Pictou, were on hand. There were touching reunions. We waited, scanned the skies, and got word that the fliers had landed at Mere Point. In a flash the airport was deserted, and the newspaper men were dashing to long distance telephones to rouse local correspondents in Harpswell, Bath, Brunswick and Portland, mobilizing a veritable army at sleepy Mere Point.

The next day the fliers actually came to Boston; and again the wires thundered with the news. We wrote up to the moment the last train left for New York, and then dashed south again, by rail.

The old Richmond crowd was separated now. But when newspapermen gathered before the reviewing stand at Mitchel Field, Mineola, to await the fliers there, veterans appeared. Camera men last seen at Ice Tickle planted their tripods before the Prince of Wales. Members of the "Farthest North Press Club" were there, smooth shaven, clad in city clothes.

Out of the sky roared the three huge 'planes. Once more they circled down before us. Once more we dashed for Lieut. Lowell Smith. Once more mid the cheers of the crowd we filed our stories.

The fliers roar on, bound for Washington. The survivors of Reykjavik, the veterans of the Farthest North Press Club, are scattered. Yet somewhere, westward, three great 'planes go hurtling through the sky. Other newspapermen gather beside distant flying fields, scanning the sky whence three black dots will soon appear.

Do Twins Look Alike?

The Des Moines Sunday Register recently published pictures of sixty-four Iowa children, thirty-two pairs of twins, in its rotogravure section.

"Can you match the twins?" was asked of the 130,000 subscribers of The Sunday Register.

Eighteen thousand three hundred and twenty readers thought they could. Their replies filled over 200 mail sacks.

One out of every seven Sunday Register subscribers competed.

How's that for responsive circulation?

THE POWER

I

There is a thing called Power of the Press—
A swift intangible Force, a thing that throbs
Its influence to the recluse and the mobs,
To crowded cities, to the Wilderness.
It belts the universe, it spans the stars,
Is felt in peace and doubly felt in wars.

II

Born yesternight, a soul's revolt it stood
Growing still stronger with the light of day;
Crowding the weakling, from its tortuous way,
It blazed its Trail from evil into good.
Ever and ever stronger grown, it stands
Symbol of freedom in a thousand lands.

III

And he who wields the Power . . . who stands alone
Pressing the button, sending on its way
A force to bless or curse, to lift or slay,
To make an empire, overthrow a throne . . .
Let him beware! This Power is not a tool
To work the purpose of a Knave or Fool!

MIDWEST CIRCULATORS MEET IN LINCOLN

President Blake and All Officers Reelected—Insistence on Daily Sensation Harmful, Convention Told

(By Telegraph to Editor & Publisher)

Lincoln, Neb., Sept. 10.—Mid-west Circulation Managers Association, comprising the states of Nebraska, Colorado, Kansas, Missouri and Oklahoma, closed a successful two-day convention here Wednesday evening after re-electing the present officers for another year and voting to hold the next meeting in Colorado Springs, Colo., June 8, preceding the session of the International Association.

Officers are:—President, H. S. Blake, Capper Publications, Topeka, Kan.; vice-president, Walt B. Reynolds, Freemont (Neb.) Tribune; secretary-treasurer, Will A. Butler, Colorado Springs Gazette-Telegraph. The directors are: C. D. McCauley, Wichita Beacon; Roy Bailey, Salina (Kan.) Journal; Hugh Brown, Kearney (Neb.) Hub; M. W. Halmbacher, Oklahoma City Oklahoman Times; Sidney D. Long, Wichita Eagle; John Levand, Denver Post; and R. J. Seeman, St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Only two prepared papers were read: "How to Get the Co-operation of the Mothers of Carriers," by Sallie Lea Davis of the Sterling (Col.) Advocate, and "How Competitive Circulation Managers in the Same City May Work Together to Mutual Advantage," by Ralph J. Seeman, of the St. Louis Globe-Democat.

The greater part of the convention was devoted to round-table discussions. City circulation problems were taken up Thursday while Wednesday was devoted to county circulation questions. In the general group topics touched on the sort of articles necessary to make the paper sell, economy, and ways of enlarging circulation.

In his address of welcome Will Owen Jones, editor of the Nebraska State Journal, told the circulation men that the old time leadership of the editor is gone. The editor goes wrong, he said, in trying to spin ideas without moving from his office to find what the buyers of the paper want. The circulation manager goes wrong, he pointed out, when he insists on big headlines, something sensational every day. Such a practice, he said hurts the long-standing prestige of a newspaper. Constructive editorial and news policies were championed by Mr. Long.

The association's banquet was held Tuesday night tendered by the Lincoln Star and State Journal. Following the luncheon Wednesday noon at the Chamber of Commerce, the visitors inspected the new plant of the Lincoln Star.

The question of admitting circulation managers of the State of Arkansas into the Mid-West Association was deferred until the next semi-annual convention.

The convention went on record as working toward better service to the publisher, better service to the public and mutual co-operation between competitive circulation managers.

LE SOLEIL LOSES LIBEL CASE

Judge Rules Comments Made in Legislature Not Privileged

A libel action just decided in the Superior Court of Quebec possesses some unusual features which will be of interest to editors. Le Soleil of Quebec published editorial comments about a certain A. L. Gareau based on declarations made in the Quebec Legislature a number of years ago by the Minister of Agriculture.

Action was brought against Le Soleil by Mr. Gareau on the grounds that the comments were libellous. It was argued in defence by the newspaper that statements made in the Legislature were privileged. Judge Letellier, however, decided in favor of the plaintiff and awarded him nominal damages of $100.

In his judgment he stated that it was not the spirit of the law to give a privileged character to all that had been said in Parliaments in the past. If a newspaper used libellous comments, these became its own comments and it was responsible for them. Further, the comments in this case affected the plaintiff's private life and could not be construed as being published in the public interest.

M. E. Stone, A. P. Counselor, Predicts Great Development

The Cathedral Towns of England

YORK

York is almost without a rival for the great variety of historical monuments it possesses. The city is amazingly picturesque and is so rich in great events of English History that almost every inch is haunted, hallowed ground. The old city walls are exceptionally well preserved, and historic Bars and Gates abound, but the greatest glory of the city naturally centres round the Minster, famous throughout Europe for its general grandeur and wonderful stained glass windows.

The Cathedral stands on the site of a little wooden Church built by the Saxon King Edwin in 627. The present building was commenced early in the thirteenth century and was completed about 1472.

WHEN you ask a press builder to quote you upon a press and stereotyping equipment insist that he include in his proposal a PONY AUTOPLATE MACHINE.

You should do this because the hand worked stereotyping apparatus that press builders supply with their presses is no longer suitable to the needs of the day. It wastes time, labor, and space, and causes delays in the pressroom from broken sheets in the press.

As the AUTOPLATE way is the only modern way of making printing plates — no metropolitan newspaper makes them in any other way—you should not adopt a practice that has long been discarded by progressive newspapers everywhere throughout the world.

To follow this suggestion will save you endless trouble and expense.

EDITORIAL

GIANT AWAKENING

A REMARKABLE journalistic phenomenon has occurred in China since the Chinese Revolution of 1911. Never, until now, have the common people enjoyed a competent free press, although China gave to civilization what was unquestionably the first newspaper.

More than 2,300 years before Christ, China had a "spoken" newspaper, the news being composed in verse and chanted in the streets by the authors. Tsai Lun, a native of South China, invented manufactured paper in A. D. 75. The first paper mill in Europe was established more than 1,000 years later. China also invented the printing art in A. D. 175, when the classics were carved in relief on stone tablets which were posted in front of the imperial palaces so that scholars might rub impressions from them. This was nearly ten centuries before Gutenberg. China was doing block printing, as applied to books, in the first century, and in A. D. 1045, one Pi Shung made the first movable type in clay which he baked. Movable metal types were in extensive use in China in the Ming Dynasty, A. D. 1488-1566.

In the latter part of the first century, certain hangers-on of the Imperial Court made a practice of parading the streets bearing placards whereon they had inscribed "the august doings of the Son of Heaven and the latest news of his court." These mountebanks passed the hat as they went along. The Son of Heaven mildly disapproved, but did not squelch the business, and this is believed to be the world's first organized news service. This practice soon gave way to the actual publishing of newspapers and the sale of copies. Such is the origin of the Peking Gazette, established in the seventh century and generally read by the educated and privileged people, and similar official newspapers published in the first period of Chinese journalism.

For the four decades following 1850 China had a flourishing foreign press, made up of native and foreign languages, but initiated and promoted by foreign interests. From 1870 to 1911, a feeble native press began to rise. Since the Chinese revolution, according to Y. P. Wang of the Shun Pao, Shanghai, in a remarkably interesting booklet outlining the history of the Chinese press, more than 1,000 dailies, weeklies and monthlies have sprung up in the principal cities of China—a competent free press, in the language of the people and according to the spirit of the Chinese renaissance movement. Almost every class of people is today represented by a newspaper, there being even an organ for beggars and another one for "sing-song" girls.

The new Chinese press is well printed and some newspapers have gained large circulation. The audited circulation of the Shun Pao of Shanghai is 1,397,725.

Mr. Wang makes the interesting observation that there has never been a legal barrier to a free press in China, for the earliest unwritten tradition from the dawn of history has been favorable to freedom of speech. The written constitution of the Chinese Republic clearly and definitely guarantees liberty of the press.

However, it was only when monarchy had been overthrown and when the common people got a taste of intellectual liberty that the popular newspaper gripped China. An evidence of the birth of freedom of popular thought is cited in the fact that the newspapers now freely criticize Confucian doctrines, question such ancient customs as filial piety and demand positive statements of fact regarding conditions of life, rather than fairy stories.

Advertising, a new force in Chinese economic life, is the basis of the new press industry, but a lamentable feature is that at present the bulk of display newspaper advertising is for patent medicine concerns. Patent medicine vending is one of the chief businesses in China and newspaper readers take these cures seriously. The readers seem satisfied and this class of advertising is the chief source of income of publishers. However, there is a determined movement to find substitutes.

Great is the penalty for that type of editorial irresponsibility which exploits crime in the terms of heroism and paints seductive images of underworld characters, for the average reader is of normal temperament and discriminating.

ECCLESIASTES

Chapter III—22

Wherefore I perceive that there is nothing better, than that a man should rejoice in his own works; for that is his portion: for who shall bring him to see what shall be after him?

FOREIGN LANGUAGE PRESS

NORDISK TIDENDE, published by the Finnish Newspaper Co., of New York, editorially protests against the statement of Stanley Clague, Managing Director of the Audit Bureau of Circulations, in a recent issue of EDITOR & PUBLISHER, wherein he warned against the foreign language press as a menace to the nation.

Mr. Clague said there were 1,200 papers printed in some 30 foreign languages which, if the American people could read them, would make their blood run cold for destructive policies and doctrines advocated. He said there exists a small but growing element among foreign language newspapers which advocate true American principles.

The editor of the Nordisk Tidende, saying that his newspaper belongs to the latter group, protests that statistics, fixed by the Inter-Racial Council five years ago, numbered the foreign language newspapers as 1,232, exclusive of German. Of that number 1,051 are non-radical, while only 64 are socialist and 16 I. W. W. and communist. He says that the non-radical foreign language press has 8,000,000 circulation, against the 631,000 circulation of the radical papers. Of 62 Norse-Danish papers, only 3 are set down as socialist. Of the 320 radical publications in the United States, the editor claims, 240 are published in the English language and have a circulation of ten millions, and Mr. Clague is asked if these English papers do not constitute as much of a danger as the 631,000 circulation of foreign language radical papers.

It is the contention of the Nordisk Tidende that the foreign language papers as a whole are as loyal and patriotic as any other group of newspapers in the country.

Oh, joy—to dash off a yarn and next morning find it posted on the bulletin board and the "gang" singing your praise as a genius.

HIGHER SALARIES

DR. ERNEST GRUENING, former managing editor of Boston Traveler, later managing editor of New York Tribune, now publicity representative of the Third Party, presents in the current issue of Century an essay based on the question: "Can Journalism Be a Profession." It is a highly interesting article, but does not answer the question.

The writer deplores the scale of salaries paid to editorial men. He asserts that no copy-reader should receive less than $150 per week for work on a metropolitan paper. He does not give a scale for other departments, but thinks that the "rank and file are wretchedly underpaid." He says that a newspaper editor should be rated and paid as high as a bank or railroad president; managing editors as high as vice-presidents of such commercial institutions.

Dr. Gruening says: "Journalism is important because in the evolution of our complex problems of democracy, public opinion is the vital factor. In the formation of this opinion the essential element is the press." He argues that good and able men should be held in daily editorial service by adequate salaries and stable employment.

Not every newspaper man will agree with all that Dr. Gruening says in criticism of the press, but his article impresses us as the most intelligent discussion of the many that have appeared in the magazines since the New York Herald sale.

Show him how to sell his wares—that's advertising!

A SCRAMBLED INTERVIEW

WITH the facts now cleared up, it is easier to account for the scrambled interview between His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales and American newspaper men, and the subsequent hide-and-seek game at Syosset, L. I.

It seems the royal visitor at first definitely declined to meet the news men. A wireless from Cunard officials, however, informed him of the large number of press representatives who were making ready to come down the Bay and get copy from him, and he decided to make a "big thing" of the interview.

The Prince, we learn, had the royal suite on the liner cleared; a table was loaded with refreshments and smokes; a chair placed at one end from which he intended to answer individual press questions and deliver an impromptu speech.

The Prince appeared and a mob scene ensued with him in the center. Only four men of 105 could get near enough to hear what was said. And, probably because of the rush, many of the questions were really pointless. The well planned Princely interview in the luxury of the royal suite was entirely spoiled. The Prince simply made his escape as soon as possible.

His Royal Highness, as every one knows, likes pleasant publicity—the sort that would make interesting stories—but he prefers to handle an interview in his own way, a privilege that rightfully belongs to him.

Old-fashioned reporters, sent out for one story, brought in half a dozen.

FLEXIBILITY

NOTICE in this issue of EDITOR & PUBLISHER the experience of the California citrus growers this year when Dame Nature suddenly ordered a run of small sizes in oranges, precipitating changed trade conditions. It became the huge responsibility of the growers to educate 120,000,000 prospective users of this fruit that the small sizes possessed virtues. Naturally, the daily newspaper became the medium. Flexibility is one of the strong features of the newspaper as an advertising medium. The advertiser realizes this most keenly when he has a news announcement to get before the reading public, but wonderfully successful is he who, in ordinary as in extraordinary times, senses news values in advertising and plays the newspaper in that idiom. It gets the business.

FOLKS WORTH KNOWING

"WHAT Price Glory?" the title given a play of his written with Maxwell Anderson of the New York World, which opened on Broadway this week is the attitude Laurence Stallings, conductor of "The First Reader," and book reviewer for the World, takes towards life. He would tosh the fact that he is successful.

LAURENCE STALLINGS

Yet he is gifted with a power of expression in writing which promises him a golden future.

Only 29 years old, this young Southerner is also already author of a novel "Plumes" and is collecting a number of sketches of his soon to be published in book form.

Stallings was born in Atlanta, Ga. There he had his first newspaper experience, joining the staff of the Journal as reporter and holding many positions in the editorial department.

Before the United States entered the World War, Stallings enlisted in the Marine Corps for 5 years as a private. By passing tests he was designated for a commission even before war was declared and soon afterwards was made a 2nd Lieutenant. He was severely wounded at Belleau Wood, necessitating the amputation of his right leg.

After the armistice, he went to Washington where he obtained a position on the Washington Times. On this newspaper he served as financial editor, city editor and Sunday editor. His novel "Plumes" is a story with a Washington setting.

In April, 1922, he came to New York on the copy desk of the New York World. He began contributing short paragraphs and poems for the Conning Tower under the pen name of Long John Silver. Herbert Bayard Swope shortly recognized his writing ability and made him dramatic editor of the World. From this desk he became an editorial writer under the late Frank I. Cobb, finally taking his present position.

WHAT'S WHAT IN THE FEATURE FIELD

WILLIAM J. LA VARRE, the first white man to bring diamonds out of the British Guiana jungle, has written a series of 5 articles on his experiences for the Metropolitan Newspaper Service, New York.

WM. J. LA VARRE

Drawn into the interior by rumors of gold, La Varre tells how he and his companion literally stumbled upon diamonds. They found a tribe of Indians using them for grating vegetables. By the aid of a map drawn with a stick in the sand by a squaw, they made their way to what they were to call "The Creek of Diamonds."

The adventure was halted at one time by the desperate illness of La Varre, who was brought out to the coast so far gone with jungle fever that a physician refused to accept him at a hospital in Georgetown until the hospital had received a burial fee. He claims to have brought home with him $700,000 of gems in a ginger ale bottle.

La Varre, himself a Harvard man, was accompanied on the expedition by Dudley Lewis, of Yale.

Peter B. Kyne, who writes a weekly "Cappy Ricks" article for United Feature Syndicate, New York, and Mrs. Kyne, apparently had a close call from bullets in the Chinese War, according to cable dispatches from Shanghai, reaching this country this week.

Mr. Kyne and his party arrived in Shanghai about Sept. 4, on a trip around the world. Not knowing there was a war in the village of Liuho, they took a motor trip and landed in the midst of a serious fight for possession of the village by troops of Chekiang and Kiangsu.

The Americans were under fire half an hour but escaped unhurt after abandoning their car and running across country, when they were picked up and brought back to Shanghai.

Theodore A. Huntley has written a 40,000 word biography of John W. Davis for the Pittsburg Post and Sun and the New York World Syndicate. Huntley is the Post's Washington correspondent, is a personal friend of Mr. Davis and the biography has the authorization of the Democratic Candidate for President. A. E. Braun, publisher of the Post and Sun, delegated Huntley to write the biography. It is to be published in book form by Duffield & Co., New York, next month. It is illustrated with new pictures of the candidate and his ancestors.

Ring Lardner, humorist, accompanied by Mrs. Lardner, sailed from New York Sept. 10 on the Paris for a 2 months' visit in France, England, Spain and Germany. Lardner contemplates several stories on Spain's national sport.

Joseph Brainin is organizing the Seven-Arts Feature Syndicate in New York to start operating early next month.

ASSOCIATIONS

BOSTON ADVERTISING CLUB members to the number of 60, many of whom attended the recent international advertising convention in London, held a dinner dance at the Hotel Brunswick, Boston, Wednesday, Sept. 3, at which officers of the Cunard liner Samaria which carried the Boston ad men across, were guests. The dance was tendered the officers in return for the many courtesies shown members of the club aboard the Samaria. The committee in charge included Herbert Stephens, chairman; Harry L. Harding and Cyrus Kaufman.

Advertising Club of New Haven held its annual dinner Sept. 10. Frank J. Limbacher, of the H. M. Bullard Company, recently elected president, presided. The New Haven club claims it sent the largest delegation to the London A. A. C. W. convention in proportion to its size than any other club in the United States.

Labor Situation
Ideal in Altoona, Pa.

Federal Department Reports Show Factories All Operating and Great Activity In All Lines

Altoona Sector "Ideal"

THE condition in the Altoona sector of Pennsylvania's great workshop is asserted by federal officials to be as nearly "ideal" as it is possible to have it. The labor supply is said to be just about equal to the demand, with very little unemployment existing anywhere. "Notwithstanding a setback that was expected, current reports reaching Washington from Altoona indicate there will be a pronounced improvement generally there in the near future," says Secretary of Labor James J. Davis.

He points out that building continues "very active," with several office buildings and dwellings under way.

The supply of skilled and unskilled outdoor labor is fully employed and will continue to be engaged during the remainder of the summer, if federal investigators have correctly sized up the situation.

The Altoona Mirror is the leading newspaper in Altoona. In fact many merchants use its columns exclusively. If interested in central Pennsylvania, and you have a message for this thickly populated territory, send your copy to Altoona.

BUSINESS DIRECT

Invaluable to you— Mr. Publisher!

WOOD DRY MATS are not the only dry mats available. There are others—two or three kinds at least. But we claim ours are the best, and, by reason of what we supply with them gratis, they are worth decidedly more to the newspaper than any others.

We refer to the Wood Service. The free advice of skilled technical experts—expert in all mechanical departments—is an important part of the installation of the Wood Dry Mat process and goes with it at no cost to the newspaper. And it continues indefinitely, year in and year out, so that when anything goes wrong, no matter in which department, Wood Service is always available to straighten things out. And things do go wrong.

Photo-engravings, typesetting machines, slugs, case type, mat rollers, molding blankets, stereo metal, mats, autoplates, handboxes, presses, press blankets and rollers,—all covering four distinct departments, and as many trades, must be right and pull together to produce a clean, well printed paper.

If any one or two go wrong, the result is poor printing, and the publisher cannot hope to find and remedy the trouble.

Our experts know all these things intimately, and from long practical experience; they are not theorists.

This service we give you with your adoption of Wood Dry Mats. If it could be obtained elsewhere it would cost many thousands of dollars.

One publisher friend had all this in mind when he wrote us:

> "I cannot understand why any publisher should regard a difference of a penny or two in the cost of the mat as an objection to using Wood Flongs when he considers the great value of the service given gratis by your experts—not only to the stereotype room but to all mechanical departments. Your people have accomplished wonders in improving the printing of my paper and I would not consider making any changes in the plant without their intelligent co-operation. I for one appreciate what you are doing to help newspapers, in comparison to which the price of your mats is insignificant."

The WOOD DRY MAT has eliminated the last remaining primitive process in the manufacture of newspapers, and, because of quality and what goes with it, it is cheaper to use than any other dry mat.

At your service.

CANADIAN PRESS OPERATORS STRIKE AS ARBITRATION OFFER FAILS

Men's Demand for Wage Increase Met With Decrease Proposal—About 100 Operators Out—Livesay Requests Conciliation Board

DISREGARDING a demand for arbitration, all telegraphers employed by the Canadian Press went out on strike at 2 o'clock Thursday afternoon.

The press association late Thursday afternoon admitted the strike was affecting 106 newspapers.

The New York and Toronto offices were manned by non-union telegraphers keeping this circuit open for news dispatches. Long distance telephone was used to maintain connection between New York and Montreal.

Arrangements were made whereby Associated Press dispatches to Detroit were delivered to Windsor, Ont., by messenger.

One Montreal newspaper, according to a dispatch received in the Canadian Press office in New York, declared 5,000 commercial telegraphers and 6,000 railroad telegraphers might be drawn into the strike.

At the time EDITOR & PUBLISHER went to press tests were being made by the Canadian Press to see whether or not commercial telegraphers would handle press dispatches sent overhead but were unable to state the results.

The action of the operators followed a demand for an increase in wages which was met by proposal for a decrease by directors of the organization. The men are all members of the Commercial Telegraphers Union of America and were led by Paul Schnur, international vice-president.

J. F. B. Livesay, general manager of the Canadian Press, immediately requested the Dominion Deputy Minister of Labor to appoint a Board of Conciliation and Investigation.

He was notified that the union committee would ignore formation of the board and would decline to await an investigation.

Mr. Livesay telegraphed on Sept. 10, to Roscoe Johnson, International president of the union, asking him to exercise his authority to avert the strike and make arbitration possible.

Thursday morning in a statement sent over the press association wires, Livesay declared he had received no reply from Johnson, and laid the blame for the strike on Schnur, whom he characterized as "an American recently domiciled in Canada, whose methods are Prussian."

Livesay also sent a telegram to all operators warning them the strike would push the wage dispute into the background and precipitate the issue of a breach of agreement.

"By going out on strike you break the agreement between the Canadian Press and the Commercial Telegraphers Union of America entirely and we cannot thereafter negotiate further with that union," he declared.

Negotiations had continued since notice was first served on the company by the men's general chairman July 10, of amendments to the wage scale which demanded increases from the present minimum of $45 to $60 a week and from the present maximum of $51 to $72.50 a week. In reply, on Aug. 8, the company submitted proposals for wage decreases of $3 a week, for cities of over 50,000 population and of $7 a week for cities under that figure, together with certain other amendments to working conditions.

The company based its claim for reduction on the fact that the present agreement was negotiated just 4 years ago at the time when the index figures of high cost of living as shown in the official figures of the Department of Labor at Ottawa had reached its peak. From Sept. 1, 1920, when the present agreement went into effect, there was an immediate rapid decline in this index figure until today it stands but little higher than it did in 1917, the company claimed.

The Canadian Press offered to arbitrate the entire dispute, the men's proposals as well as its own, under the arbitration clause in the contract. This the union committee refused. The company then proposed to submit the whole dispute to a board of conciliation under the Department of Labor. Mr. Schnur the International vice-president, declined to go before a board of conciliation. He offered arbitration if the issue was confined to present wage scale and the men's demands for an increased scale, leaving out entirely the company's submission of a decrease. On the company refusing that proposal the strike vote was taken.

NEWSPAPERS WELCOME SCIENTIFIC PROBE

Association Presidents Believe Good Will Result from Proposed Investigation if Impartially and Fairly Conducted

The proposed scientific probe of newspapers and news gathering organizations, backed by the Laura Spellman Rockefeller Memorial Foundation, disclosed in last week's EDITOR & PUBLISHER, was welcomed by many prominent newspaper editors in telegrams addressed to this paper.

Their telegrams follow:

Casper S. Yost, president, American Society of Newspaper Editors and editor of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat:

"I think it safe to say that the press of this country will welcome a systematic survey of American journalism if it is conducted scientifically, fairly, without prejudice, and with a sincere desire to ascertain the truth. It has nothing to fear and much to gain from an investigation so conducted, but before expressing a definite opinion as to this particular inquiry I would like to have more information about its plans and purposes.

"The article of Dr. Ellis is very interesting, and arouses a degree of hope that here is an enterprise that will reveal facts and conditions of benefit to the press and to the public, but whether that hope is to become assurance depends upon the attitude of mind of the investigators, upon the scope of the inquiry, upon the methods of ascertaining the truth, and upon the use made of the information obtained.

"The field is as complex as it is vast, and it involves many aspects of psychology as well as material fact, there is room there and need for a genuinely scientific survey, one that is approached without bias, and with no other purpose than to find the truth and to state it."

George D. Lindsay, president Inland Daily Press Association:

"The proposed investigation of news sources and methods is admirable in scope and purpose. Newspapers should have nothing to lose and much to gain through it. Publication of false or misleading news is more of a crime than the dissemination of deadly disease germs.

"If there is anything wrong or vicious about either the gathering or publishing of news it should be rectified at once. The proposed investigation deserves and will receive the hearty approval of the press of the country if the work is thoroughly and impartially carried forward. The proposition is in every way commendable."

A. G. Newmyer, president Southern Newspaper Publishers Association:

"Under especial license through constitutional provision provising for freedom of the press, our newspapers handle the most important merchandise sold the public. During the war the nation accepted substitutes and adulterations in food, clothing, and other essentials, including the substitution of propaganda for cold, unbiased, uncolored news.

"The newspapers owe a duty of working unceasingly to maintain pure news sources and to welcome any and all serious examinations and investigations of both method and motive. The Rockefeller Institute proposal will be welcomed by all honest newspapers. The editorial affairs of this association stands ready to co-operate to the limit."

Karl A. Bickel, president of the United Press Associations:

"The United Press Associations is thoroughly in favor of the proposed probe, and is, in fact, always glad to have its news gathering and business methods examined by anyone interested."

L. B. Palmer, manager of the American Newspaper Publishers Association, said:

"It is gratifying to learn from your issue of September 6th that scientific associations of such high standing with ample funds for the work are to make a comprehensive investigation of the sources of propaganda and of news and its gathering.

"Surely the American Press will welcome such a study and will offer every co-operation, because it will lay at rest for all time statements by the uninformed of control of the newspapers and their news-gathering instrumentalities by financial, religious or other influences, and will at the same time aid in the further exposure, and, let it be hoped, the elimination of the press agent and his kind.

"The results of such a study will go far to discourage the critics of the American newspaper and its newsgathering organization."

To Hold Church Publicity Meet

The fifth annual conference on church publicity, under the auspices of the Chicago Church Federation, will be held on Oct. 27, at the Morrison Hotel, Walter Mee, federation secretary, has announced. The Chicago Association of Commerce advertising council is interested in the meeting.

NEW PRESSMEN'S UNION WON'T BE RASH

International Retains Control Over Officers, Members and Funds—Flyboys in a Junior Union

Organization of a new local union of New York web pressmen was ordered by the recent convention of the International Printing Pressmen's & Assistants' Union under regulations designed to prevent the union politics which caused the newspaper strike of last December. Flyboys and carriers, whose votes sent the old union on strike, will be organized in an auxiliary union, with three delegates at meetings of the senior union.

Temporary officers, to be chosen by the International board of directors will serve for 90 days while a constitution and laws are drawn to meet the international board's approval. Nominations for local officers must also obtain the board's O. K., and the directors are ordered to disapprove nominees responsible in any way for the 1923 strike.

Because of the heavy indebtedness of New York pressmen to the International the latter's directors will appoint and control the local secretary-treasurer until the finances are adjusted. The new union has been assessed the full cost of the strike, to be refunded to the International monthly, in addition to arrears.

The directors will have authority to remove any officer who violates the agreement with the publishers, or any international or local law.

Members of the old union expelled for instigating the strike cannot regain membership except by approval of the international board, which will review all applications until the 1926 convention.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT ADDS TO BUYING POWER IN The SOUTH

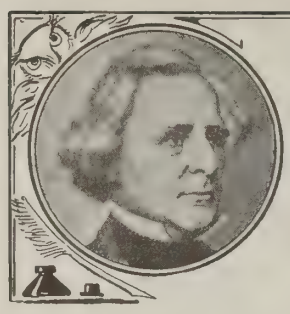
WHILE the South's great buying power is due, very largely, to the rapid strides in agricultural production, the turn to diversified manufacturing has played a great part in the opening of Southern markets for practically every class of merchandise.

The South is particularly blessed in the elements of success. This territory produces abundant raw materials, which together with cheap mechanical power make for success in manufacturing.

The farms produce the cotton which has stimulated Southern manufacturing more than any other product in the last thirty years; the farms furnish hides for leather in the shoe factories; they furnish wool for the making of clothing, and sugar from Louisiana fields for the refineries which have been built in the last decade.

In view of all this it is not surprising that the geographic center of cotton manufacturing has shifted from New England to the South. Southern mills are now consuming nearly 60 per cent of all cotton used in American plants.

The swift development of the cotton spinning industry is typical of what has been taking place in other lines of manufacture. The metals, petroleum, coal and timber produced in the South are in an increasing degree being worked up at home.



Those who regard the South as being chiefly a farming territory will be surprised to learn that the value of the South's manufactures is somewhat larger than the value of the territory's agricultural products, as given by the U. S. census.

The possibilities for industrial development have scarcely been touched and are bound to increase, to a greater degree, the purchasing power, of not only the South, but of the entire nation.

A national business cannot do better than start an advertising campaign in the newspapers and cities given on this page, irrespective of any other operations elsewhere.

NEW AND AUTHENTIC HISTORY OF THE HERALD OF THE BENNETTS

By ALBERT EVANDER COLEMAN—41 Years on the New York Herald staff

COPYRIGHT 1924 BY EDITOR & PUBLISHER—ALL RIGHTS, INCLUDING FOREIGN RIGHTS, PROTECTED.

The Herald and the Slavery Problem

By 1855 the question of the continuance of Negro slavery in the Southern States had become a great, burning issue, and the abolitionists in New England, headed by Garrison, were pursuing a policy which Mr. Bennett warningly denounced as "highly dangerous"! His course on the question has been considered wise and patriotic, as tending to prevent bloodshed and the disruption of the Union, and he again and again deplored the "fanaticism" of the abolitionist leaders. In January, 1855, he drew inferences as to the unpopularity of the movement in the North, from the fact that its journalistic advocates were being forced to reduce their expenses, due to a falling off in circulation and advertising patronage. Under the heading of "Curtailment of the Anti-Slavery Newspaper Press," he said:

"Abolitionism in the North is in a state of decay—rapid decay. The present hard times have put it to the test, and it is sinking under the pressure. This fact has been strikingly illustrated within the last few months, in the curtailment of the daily anti-slavery journals of this city. The last and most striking example among them being the cutting down of the Journal of Commerce, to the extent of about one-third from its late ambitious but ruinous dimensions.

"In the matter of curtailment the Tribune led the way, in a marked reduction of its size, and in the substitution of a cheap and inferior quality of paper in place of a comparatively expensive article. Next, our junior Seward organ—the Times, adopted the same expedient of 'making both ends meet.' Next the Sun in the reduction of its sheet, at a single blow diminished its annual bill for white paper to the extent of ten or twelve thousand dollars. Lastly, the Journal of Commerce, the founder of the whole school of our modern anti-slavery journals, has from the same cause been driven to the same extremity. It opens the New Year very considerably shorn of its fair proportions. Another such downward step, including its limited and rather private circulation, will bring it fairly within reach of that 'Robert Macaire' of Wall Street, the New York Express.

"Our hard-up contemporaries of the Journal of Commerce, with their issue of the first day of the New Year, say that, 'With the compliments of the season we present our sheet in a somewhat reduced form, though still large enough for convenience.' No doubt of it; especially for the 'convenience' of the publishers. * * * Here then are the facts: the Journal of Commerce, like the Tribune, Times and Sun, succumbs to the pressure of the existing hard times. Why is this? It is because they are all identified with abolitionism.

"The Journal of Commerce was the pioneer of the daily abolition newspapers of the North. It was started some 30 years ago by Arthur Tappan, the great leader of the modern abolitionists, as an out-and-out flaming firebrand of immediate emancipation. Tappan put into this dashing enterprise an investment of $30,000. The object was to 'carry the war into Africa'—that is, into the South, and first Maxwell and then a Boston man named Hale, fresh from the very hotbed of abolitionism, edited it.

"Since that day the Journal of Commerce has fallen from grace—the glory or infamy, whichever it may be, of having been the pioneer of the modern Garrison school of abolitionists belongs to it. * * *

"Latterly the editorial control has fallen into the hands of a saintly moralist of the name of Butler, but not in the highest estimation for sanctity among his Wall Street neighbors. While pretending to advocate the rights of the South under the Constitution, he allows his paper to receive contributions for the purchase of the freedom of 'the slave, Harry,' or, 'the slave, Pompey!' * * * Thus a single number of the Journal of Commerce, falling into the hands of a slave who can read, may infect the negroes of a half dozen plantations with its insidious poison, and we doubt not that this is more the real intent of Master Butler than the liberty of 'Harry' or 'Pompey.'"

In 1855, Mr. Robert Crean, the brother-in-law of Mr. Bennett, and who had been a member of the staff in the Counting Room for some time, was given entire charge of the Financial Department, and was cashier for many years thereafter.

Speakers for the October meeting of the Inland Daily Press Association have been announced by Wil V. Tufford, secretary and treasurer. Sessions are scheduled for Oct. 16-17 at the LaSalle Hotel, Chicago.

The growing misuse of the power delegated to judges, of all degrees, by the use of "Contempt of Court" procedure—a nation-wide subject will be discussed by Stuart H. Perry, of the Adrian Telegram from both the standpoint of the newspaper, as an upholder of the courts, and the misuse of it by judges.

"Ancient newspapers, and Aging Newspaper Publishers," is the general topic assigned to George W. Purcell, of the Vincennes Sun.

The threats by some national advertisers in their efforts to secure free advertising, and especially recent interviews with representatives of the Ford Company along this line will probably be assigned to Linwood I. Noyes, of Ironwood.

Hon. Frank O. Lowden will be guest of honor at the luncheon Wednesday, Oct. 15, and speak on "The Relation of the Newspaper to the New Farm Era."

Others on the program and their subjects are:

Williams, secretary of the Illinois State Press Association, Springfield, on "State Press Associations, Their Organization and Function"; Frank T. Carroll, president of the Newspaper Advertising Executive Association, on "Newspaper Advertising"; Professor Wm. G. Bleyer, of the University of Wisconsin, "Is Journalism a Profession?" Mrs. E. O. Susong, publisher of the Greenville (Tenn.) Democrat Sun, "A Woman's Experience as a Newspaper Publisher."

Southern Daily Improving Plant

The Spartanburg (S. C.) Sun celebrated the sixth month of its existence this week with the placing of an order for a Goss 24-page rotary press. In addition to the new press, contract has been let for enlarging The Sun's present three-story building to give it virtually double its present floor space. A. M. Carpenter is president and editor of the Sun; J. T. Fain is publisher and business manager, and E. G. Denham, formerly of the Atlanta Georgian, is managing editor.

"ONLY GENUINE NEWSPAPER"

From "The Continent," Aug. 28, 1924.

The news in a newspaper is its reason for existence. All sorts of "features" are added to attract and hold the interest of this group and that * * * but if the news were omitted it wouldn't be a newspaper.

Which expression leads up to the remark that it is about time somebody tried the experiment elsewhere than in New York of producing a newspaper. The only genuine newspaper in all the large cities of America is The New York Times.

LOCAL industries! How long is it since you looked over large local manufacturing institutions for display and classified possibilities?

What message has the general manager of a local factory for the readers of your newspaper?

Drop in on him and talk over his problems and show him how your newspaper may co-operate in solving them.

Newspaper executives often think only of local manufacturers in terms of special editions or of classified lineage, the latter usually being handed in, but it is surely worth the effort to investigate the prospect of an occasional display page to serve some special cause of a local manufacturer, even if he does not expect to find the market for his product in your city.

An eastern Canada advertising manager increased the revenue of a daily newspaper by arranging a special page of advertising to be run thrice weekly during the hunting season—September, October and November. Dealers in rifles, ammunition, bird decoys, hunting apparel, tents, camping supplies, etc., were solicited and little difficulty was encountered in filling the page. By way of reader interest, a half column of information for hunters was injected amidships in the page, this material changing once weekly.—W. McNulty, St. John, Can.

A Southern city hit on a fine idea when they laid out a page in the form of a calendar for the month, and designated a space representing one day to each of thirty advertisers. The page was made more attractive by the use of red and black ink.—George C. Marcley, Ogdensburg (N. Y.) Republican-Journal.

A group of private school and college ads comprising a complete section was recently secured by the Washington (D. C.) Times-Herald, and used with reading material furnished by some of the leading local educators.—C. M. Litteljohn, Washington, D. C.

What stores in your city carry special shoes and special equipment for the use of people who suffer with fallen arches and other foot troubles? It would be a good idea to get up a group page of ads of such concerns with an appropriate heading over the page.—Frank H. Williams, Fort Wayne, Ind.

The real estate editor can be of inestimable assistance to the business advertising department by apprising the department of the completion of new building projects of quasi-public interest. Contractors and architects figuring in construction will many times want to boost their completed job with ads. By keeping in touch with the merchants and other advertisers, asking their opinions on business conditions and printing trade items having news value, the business editor builds good will and the ad solicitor finds a warmer greeting awaiting him. It is a good point if the business editor in his interviews refrains absolutely from discussing advertising.—R. L. Walsh, Bridgeport (Conn.) Telegram.

One progressive newspaper hit the nail on the head when they published a page 4 days in advance under the caption, "School Begins September 2." In the center of the page was a 3 column picture of the High School of that city, a list of the faculty, courses and subjects as well as regulations of the school followed. On each side of this column merchants of the city advertised their services in connection with the opening of the school.—George C. Marcley, Ogdensburg (N. Y.) Republican-Journal.

Wire expense—telephone and telegraph—has been materially reduced by having all proposed messages submitted to department heads before they are put through. It has been found that frequently, mail will serve the purpose just as well and at much lower cost.—B. A. T.

As a result of persistent rumors throughout the country that Long Beach and Southern California was having an industrial and business depression the Long Beach Press issued a special "Truth About Long Beach Edition" which besides its usual circulation was mailed out of the city to over 20,000 people. The edition was twice its usual size being 56 pages. Many business men, that ordinarily do not use newspaper space swelled the advertising revenue. The news columns were given over to building permit statistics, population growth, harbor and industrial activities and other specially written matter to refute the rumors about the city. Such an edition could be brought out in many large cities.—H. J. A. Long Beach, Cal.

WHOLE CLASSIFIED PAGE FOR STORE

Unique Stunt in Decatur Review to Put Over Department Store Sale —Advertise 339 Separate Items in Usual "Liner" Form

Something bright and new—a full page of classified advertisements, in the form of the usual classified page, published by a department store!

The page was a feature of the Decatur Review, Decatur, Ill., of the issue for Friday, Sept. 5. It contained 339 separate items offered by Linn & Scruggs, a leading department store. An 8-column banner line topped the page, merely labeling it and announcing a "removal sale," with the time of opening and closing of the store.

Goods were advertised in from 3 to 6 lines, classified as "Army Goods," "Auto Supplies," etc., throughout 35 departments. A sample liner, picked at random and classified under "Wash Goods," was as follows: "Printed Voiles—40 inches wide. Pretty styles and colorings. Removal sale price 29c per yard. Main floor."

The page looked exactly like the regular classified pages of Decatur Review.

EDITOR & PUBLISHER learns that the advertisement was suggested, the copy written, ads made up by the Review's classified advertising service department and that it ran at the regular classified rate.

Excellent results obtained by the store from the use of the regular classified columns encouraged the use of a full page to put over the removal sale.

This is believed to be an absolutely unique advertising stunt.

FAST TIME ON EXTRA

Chicago Herald Examiner Out with Caverly Decision in 1 Minute

Within one minute after Judge John R. Caverly had pronounced the sentence of life imprisonment upon the Chicago murderers, Nathan Leopold Jr. and Richard Loeb, the Chicago Herald and Examiner was distributing the news in extras released simultaneously in every part of the city.

The sentence was read at 9:35 o'clock the morning of Sept. 10. At 9:36 A. M. residents miles away from the Criminal Courts Building had copies of the Herald and Examiner extra in their hands and knew that the slayers had escaped the noose long before the radio or telephone could flash the sentence.

This news beat is without parallel in the history of Chicago journalism, the Herald and Examiner declares.

Our Own World of Letters

By JAMES MELVIN LEE

TO Richard Hooker it must have been a work of love to have compiled "The Story of An Independent Newspaper" (MacMillan Company). Samuel Bowles founded the Springfield Republican in 1824. It has since been conducted by a son and a grandson of the same name. Mr. Hooker, the author of the volume, is a grandson of the second Bowles and has been connected with the Republican for something like a quarter of a century.

Obviously, Mr. Hooker writes his pages with a sympathetic pen. To the reader he frankly confesses:

> A history of an institution written, as this has been, by one of its members, cannot hope to be regarded as impartial, however close the adherence to recorded fact and publicly expressed opinion. But is may hope to interpret some things of which there can be no formal record and the significance of which no disinterested historian could understand.

In two ways the influence of the Springfield Republican has extended beyond its natural boundaries. Its editorial page has always commanded the respect of the larger dailies throughout the country. Its editorials have had a wide distribution through reprints in exchanges. Often these same editorials slightly changed in sentence structure have found their way into country weeklies without credit to the Republican. But I have no desire to be too hard on the overworked rural editor who had a hard enough time to get out his job work without trying to think up something original for his editorial page.

The second way in which the Republican has wielded a tremendous influence is described in detail in a chapter entitled "The Republican as a School of Journalism." Samuel Bowles II, unable to pay the salaries demand by competent editorial writers, met the situation through developing new men upon whom he impressed his own ideas of journalism. As these men gradually left the Republican for papers in other cities the vacancies were filled by men similarly trained by Bowles. William Seaver Wood, the present editor of the Literary Digest, once told me that for a short time Bowles actually charged tuition for his instruction. I wish Mr. Hooker had said something on this phase of the subject.

The story of how the Republican changed from a paper with an outside view to one with a closer scrutiny of local affairs is picturesquely told. A pivotal point was when the daily was established. The announcement contained the following:

> To the end that we may succeed in our undertaking, we shall endeavor, by all the means in our power, to make an interesting sheet. It will not be particularly devoted to politics, but we mean to make it also a news paper, and especially a local one—as well as a medium for the discussion of matter of local interest!

Recent consolidations prove the truth of this quotation:

> With more prophetic insight than he sometimes had when in the midst of battles against prejudice, Mr. Bowles forecast in 1876 that the future of American journalism was to be marked "by fewer newspapers." This prediction was made in an editorial analyzing the newspaper situation in New York as it stood in October of that year.

The political and economic side of newspaper making naturally demand most of the chapters but at the same time the ethical phase is not overlooked. Of special interest to the business office is the chapter on "The Newspaper and the Advertiser."

The volume is not without touches of humor. On May 13, 1837, for example, there appeared in the formal marriage notices of the Republican the following:

> In Cooperstown, N. Y., Mr. Abel Price, age 22, to Mrs. Euphronia Rugg, age 69—
>
> Their marriage sure is snug,
> They joined them in a trice,
> And now 'tis clear that one old Rugg
> Has fetched a handsome Price.

To me the volume has unusual interest because my first newspaper job, as I think I have once mentioned in this department, was on the Springfield Union. I never could understand why the Republican positively refused to be drawn into any controversy with The Union. Mr. Hooker clears up this matter when he says:

> When in 1872 certain of his (Bowles) associates obtained control of the Springfield Union, the Republican made note of the new management and spoke of it in cordial terms. After that the Republican followed its now invariable custom, which he established, of making no editorial reference to local newspaper rivals. It refused in this way to be drawn into those personal newspaper controversies by which so many communities are edified, exasperated, bored or disgusted.

One attractive feature found in the volume should not be overlooked. I refer to those glimpses found here and there of other famous editors and publishers who were the comtemporaries of Bowles, his son or grandson. Such features make the volume interesting to those living outside of New England.

* * *

MENTION may be made of two volumes of interest to the working press—even though printed for private distribution. The New York Press Association has compiled "Newspaper Law for New York." The volume has been distributed only to active members of the Association who are pledged to return the book upon withdrawing from the organization.

The second volume, "Promises of Journalism," contains the proceedings at the last convention of The American Society of Newspaper Editors.

W. H. BURRILL, SYRACUSE JOURNAL, DIES

Business Manager and Secretary of Publishing Company Succumbs to Pneumonia Attack Sept. 5—Brother of Publisher

SYRACUSE, N.Y., Sept. 8.—W. Howard Burrill, business manager of the Syracuse Journal, died at Crouse-Irving Hospital here last Friday after less than a week's illness. Death was due to bronchial pneumonia. He was taken ill early in the week and was confined to his home. His condition did not appear serious, but it grew worse and he was taken to the hospital. Friday morning he suffered a relapse, but recovered, only to be stricken with a second which proved fatal. He was only 38.

Two years ago he was made business manager and secretary of the Syracuse Journal Company. He was also made a director of the company.

By ROYSTON CRANE

One of the Youngest Comic Strip Artists in the Game

ROYSTON C. Crane is probably the youngest comic strip artist in the country, which means nothing. The fact that he has managed to cram several more seasons of experience into his allotted score and two years than most people do, means far more.

Royston C. Crane

His diary reads like a Greek translation of "I Wonder What It's All About." Life is largely that way with youth, Roy believes; blind, eager, restless youth with its misplaced ambitions, cocksureness, heartaches, ever striving blindly upward. That's what he tries to interpret in his comic strip, "Washington Tubbs II." It's a part of himself.

1901. Was born near the intersection of two west Texas cow trails.

1906. Drew picture of horse and was considered cute.

1908. Drew picture of teacher and was considered smart aleck.

1913. First job was selling papers at a dollar a week; wasn't worth that.

1915. etc. Devoted to alley baseball, stealing watermelons, and mumps.

1916-1917. Began noticing life, and trying out various jobs when not in school. Served for short periods as soda jerker, farmer, amateur cow puncher, bill collector, and inspector of putrid potatoes at a wholesale grocery. Not good at any, the bosses frankly admitted.

1918. Attended college for awhile, then drove stakes with the Chautauqua; later got his first job as a cartoonist with the Fort Worth Record, but was fired upon asking for raise at end of first week; roustabout in oil fields, tramp, and expressman.

1919. Tried the University of Texas; persistent but dumb, so changed to Chicago Academy of Fine Arts. Thought he was becoming too good there, so returned to college, where he miraculously lasted a full session.

1921-1922. Worked way through school as a reporter on the Austin American, but was soon bounced from school because he couldn't pass a course in English composition. Hoboed over southwest, then caught a tramp steamer for foreign climes; beachcombed in Antwerp, and was later on ship that nearly sank during storm, but managed to weather the gale only to explode and burn. Gave up the sea while able, and accepted handsome offer from the New York World.

1923. Salary raised a dollar. Free lanced.

1924. Went to NEA Service in Cleveland, where he originated the character of Wash Tubbs.

GROSSMAN JOINS N. Y. GRAPHIC

New York Sunday World Artist to Draw for Macfadden

Elias M. Grossman, well known for his extraordinary portraits and city-life scenes, made through the medium of the etched copper plate, has joined the staff of New York Graphic, to do outdoor sketching with the etcher's needle.

Until recently Mr. Grossman was on the art staff of New York Sunday World. His work has recently been exhibited at the National Academy of Art and the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts. His portraits of types from the East Side and sketches of crowded streets or romantic by-ways of the metropolis have won fame for him. The artist was born in Russia. He started life as a cap-maker and is self-educated.

Plain Dealer Adopts 12 Em Column

The Cleveland Plain Dealer, Sept. 5, changed its column width from 12½ ems to 12 ems, thereby cutting off 4 ems in the width of the pages. The Cleveland Press adopted the 12-em column width measure a good while ago. The saving in print paper by the change in width, it is understood, will affect an annual economy of several thousand dollars.

HUNCHES

ONE DOLLAR WILL BE PAID FOR EACH "HUNCH" PUBLISHED

"THE Other Fellow's Job" proved one of the most popular series any Cleveland newspaper ever used. It appeared for several consecutive weeks in the Cleveland Times, an article appearing each day on some "fellow's job." The idea is based on the popular fancy that the "other fellow" has the best job. Different reporters were given assignments of interviewing persons in various lines of work and getting information on hours, wages, conditions, treatment, etc. Some of the many jobs covered were hotel bell hop, manicurist, telephone girl, waitress, judge, banker, lawyer, architect, street car employe, railroad engineer, dress-maker's model, barber, politician, physician, etc. The information is easy to get, the series is entertaining and it is highly informative..—M. R. Hall, Cleveland Times.

How far does food travel to the dinner tables in your town? Many local foodstuffs are doubtless furnished, but consider coffee from Brazil and sugar from Cuba, which are daily articles of nearly every menu. These will make interesting a story which should include the delicacies from other countries, as well as the domestic products which, no matter where you live, are hauled from distant as well as neighboring states.—C. M. Littlejohn, Washington, D. C.

Are there factories in your district which sell their products to the chance buyer who would ordinarily buy in a retail store? Do they sell their workers or outsiders their products at reduced prices? Are "good" seconds sold at prices which the retailer cannot compete? The leading retailers of any town or city can generally answer these questions if the mills won't. The retailer objects to such practices. Build a story on interviews obtained.—R. L. Walsh, Bridgeport (Conn.) Telegram.

Scores of names of Iowa towns which appear on early maps of the state have been changed or the towns themselves have entirely disappeared. A map of 1868 noted a town in Davis county, named "Uncle Abe," evidently after Abraham Lincoln. Today the maps show no record of it, although a few old settlers of that part of the state recall that there was such a community at one time.. There are many maps available which will make an interesting story.—L. J. Jellison, Dubuque (Ia.) Times Journal.

The country doctor often is one of those quietly heroic figures who do so much with so little acclaim. The Boston Globe sent a man to accompany the country doctor on his rounds and find out why, dispite the killing pace, he usually lives to be old and healthy. It made a live story.—James M. Mosely, Boston.

Is there a taxidermist in your town? An interview with an Omaha taxidermist developed much interesting information on the subject of freaks and rare animals of this vicinity. He had mounted 100 two-headed calves, every one of whose owners thought he had the only one.—Bess Furman, Omaha (Neb.) News.

What is the "flivver hobo" doing to your town? How does he treat the free tourist camp nearby? How light does he travel and in what nondescript machines? How far does he travel, and how much kick does he get out of it? Some interesting stories may be collected from and about the "flivver hobo" around the tourist camp or open spaces near the various towns.—C. M. Littlejohn, Washington, D. C.

An amusing story can be obtained by assigning a reporter to investigate the knowledge, ignorance, or otherwise, of the public respecting Latin and other inscriptions on public buildings, statues, etc., in your city. Denver has a very impressive arch in front of the Union Depot at the foot of 17th street. Above the arch the newcomer reads "Welcome." The departing visitor, approaching the station, reads, "Mizpah" above the arch. A great many people leave Denver wondering just what, "Mizpah" means. A stranger who asked the writer declared it was his eighth attempt to get an exact definition. —John T. Bartlett, R. R. No. 2, Box 279, Boulder, Colo.

Most people now-a-days miss the thrill of a truly big fire because modern fire-fighting methods are so efficient as to make conflagrations such as featured the days of old almost impossible today. Get your fire chief to give you a list of the biggest fires your city ever had, together with the dates they occurred; then go to the public library and refer to the old newspaper files for accounts of the historic blazes. Assemble this data and run a series of articles on old time fires, reproducing all the thrill and kick that was noted in the days of wooden buildings, horse-drawn apparatus and inadequate fire-fighting equipment.—M. R. Hall, Cleveland Times.

Many of the big tower clocks of a city have stories connected with them capable of being worked up into a feature which will be sure to prove popular. Frequently the care-takers will prove to be quaint characters whose greatest pride is the big clock. A description of the methods of caring for the mechanism, when and how it is regulated, etc. should be included.—Cyril E. Lamb, 309 Ballard St., Ypsilanti, Mich.

Here's a new angle on the old "What Do You Think?" and "The Inquiring Reporter" series. Why not have the readers of your newspapers not only submit questions to be answered but have your readers ask this question of five of his friends, prepare the answers and send them to your paper? Offer weekly or monthly prizes for the best questions and the best complete series. Interest in this series would be renewed by this arrangement.—G. Smedal, Sioux City (Ia.) Tribune.

Many public buildings, particularly state capitols, contain large groups of paintings and pictures of men who have had careers within the walls of the structure. By studying these pictures, and studying the history of the work done in the building, a series of good feature articles, illustrated with photographs of the paintings, may be developed.—Ray E. Lee, 2310 Guadalupe, Austin, Tex.

"NOT ME," SAYS FOSTER

Newspaper Man, Not a Politician, Is Publisher of Houston Chronicle

Marcellus E. Foster, publisher and editor of Houston Chronicle, Houston, Tex., this week declined the proffer of Democratic national committeemen. In his newspaper he said: "I have never yet sought any political appointment, and after some 30 years of active newspaper work I am not inclined to change my views. I do not think that the head of a newspaper, especially one who directs its editorial policies, should enter into politics from a personal standpoint. I have never been anything but a newspaper man, do not know anything else, nor do I crave a higher honor."

He expressed full appreciation of the "kind thoughts," but said in conclusion: "I expect nothing, want nothing and will accept nothing."

SNOWBALLS

Getting readers, holding them. Getting more readers. Holding them. Continuing this process. The Metropolitan Weekly Short Fiction Service is a snowball feature.

Proof? Its record in a lot of A-1 papers (for nearly five years now with the earliest subscribers). Most of them subscribed on our say-so.

But how many would have kept this Fiction if it didn't pull—and pull?

No, the celebrated snowball in h... has more chance of staying put than a feature that doesn't succeed.

Metropolitan Weekly Short Fiction will succeed in your paper.

You Can Win Distribution and Sales In

New York State

NEW YORK STATE Daily Newspapers excel in producing business for advertisers, because of the exceptional service established for a state-wide distribution.

New York State has 8390 miles of steam railways, over which are run hundreds of freight trains every twenty-four hours.

There is also a network of trolley lines which covers the State's centers of population. Communication and transportation have here been developed to a higher point of perfection than in any other state in the nation.

New York has 800 miles of navigable ocean, lake and river waterways, the State being penetrated by the State Barge Canal, which has a capacity for the passage of 20,000,000 tons of freight annually.

In addition to these systems of facilitating distribution, New York State has 203,846 trucks and commercial cars.

No state in the Union has better facilities for speedy transportation of every conceivable thing, from the smallest parcel to trainloads or shiploads of heaviest and bulkiest products produced.

In any advertising campaign New York State should top the list. These dailies are important, progressive influential newspapers. They are "result-getters."

THE DOMINANT AFTERNOON NEWSPAPER in Portland, Oregon

THE important part played by the Consolidated Press Association every day in the making of The Oregon Journal at Portland proves conclusively that the C.P.A. is a national service suitable alike for the needs of enterprising newspapers from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

"For three and one-half years," writes Donald Sterling, Managing Editor of The Oregon Journal, "we have taken the Consolidated Press Association daily report. The Journal regards the Consolidated Press report as a most valuable source of material for the publication of a thorough newspaper.

"Consolidated Press financial reports and statistical tables enable The Journal to print complete and accurate business news, and to print it first. The feature news stories of the Consolidated Press, through a variety of subject matter and location, are of compelling interest."

The foregoing was written by one of the most discriminating managing editors in America. The columns of The Oregon Journal are noted for their completeness and thoroughness and it is this which has achieved for The Journal the dominance of the afternoon field in Portland, both in circulation and advertising.

"Chicago's streets are paved with gold—bricks"

Yeah—that's what they all say when they try to get something for nothing and get nothing for something. Honest people don't buy gold bricks—nor sell them.

But there is gold in abundance in Chicago—real gold, for those who dig for it. Fortunes are being piled up here continually by hustling diggers. Merchants, manufacturers, workers of all kinds fare well in Chicago if they are progressive and industrious. Chicago almost makes its own prosperity. It produces less than it consumes of many commodities; more than it consumes of others. Thus it is in an ideal position to "trade." Trade makes prosperity.

The people of Chicago are prosperous, and generous buyers—though they "shop" carefully and have well defined buying habits.

Their outstanding habit, as experienced advertisers know, is to look for advertising news in The Chicago Daily News.

The Daily News is a part of the family life in the great majority of financially competent households of Chicago, where English is read. And advertisers in its pages share the confidence and esteem in which its readers hold it. That is why, year after year, The Daily News carries a greater volume of advertising than any other daily paper in Chicago.

New England States

THE percentage of Savings Bank Depositors is greatest in New England.

Massachusetts, with a population of 3,852,356, has 2,593,287 savings bank depositors, or 67 per cent of the population. New Hampshire ranks next with 58 per cent, followed by Connecticut with 54 per cent, Vermont 33 per cent, Maine 31 per cent and Rhode Island 27 per cent respectively.

Forty per cent of America's savings is concentrated in New England, which contains only seven per cent of America's population.

The number of telephones in use, in proportion to the population, gives a very good idea of the class of people living within a state or territory. In this respect, New England makes a remarkable showing, over 15 per cent of its population being telephone subscribers.

These newspapers in these cities have no equal as a group, anywhere in the United States. The cities are leaders in prosperity in these New England States and the papers are leaders in service.

Increasing your sales in

Philadelphia

A neglected field grows nothing but weeds and a farmer who permits this does not make much progress.

The same thought can be applied to merchandising.

What does it profit a manufacturer to get his goods on the dealer's shelves if he does not continually create public demand to move them?

A line of goods that is not constantly moving is a triple loss. The manufacturer fails to get re-orders, the dealer is "stuck" with the goods, and the consumer if not apprised of the opportunity to buy loses the chance to get an article that may have real merit.

If you have distribution in Philadelphia, consistent advertising in Philadelphia's leading newspaper—The Bulletin—will help increase your sales.

Business Bureaus Concentrate Attack on Radio and Movie Ad Frauds

Probe Being Aimed Directly at Deceptions in Radio Equipment Copy and Cinema Stock Selling Schemes—Course Outlined at Los Angeles B. B. B. Meet—Barnard Reelected President

By PHILIP SCHUYLER

THE greatest advertising frauds in the United States today exist in the radio and moving picture industries.

So declared Kenneth Barnard, reelected president of the National Better Business Bureaus Inc., who returned to New York this week from the fifth annual conference of the corporation held in Los Angeles, September 2 to 5.

Reports at the Los Angeles meeting disclosed the rotteness existing in the two industries named, Barnard said. The conference also reported that the oil frauds had been effectively cleaned up in Fort Worth and Los Angeles and were much less conspicuous today than a year ago.

Wheels were set in motion to combat new advertising evils. To this end the policy of the corporation has been changed to provide means of more specialized and concerted action, Barnard announced.

"Radio pirates are substituting counterfeit parts for genuine and are making wild, unfounded claims for reception and elimination of static in their advertising copy," Bernard stated.

To meet this situation a radio expert has been retained by the Better Business Bureaus. To him all advertised radio products under suspicion are being sent for scientific tests for genuineness.

Stock selling frauds, rampant in the moving picture industry, were exposed at the conference and steps immediately taken to stamp out this evil. Co-operation of the leaders in the cinema field both moral and financial has been obtained by the Better Business Bureaus to carry on this fight.

"Joseph Schenke, official representative for Will Hays, president of the Motion Picture Producers and Distributors of America, Inc., met with the Better Business Bureau delegates in Los Angeles and promised them full support in all their investigations in the moving picture field.

"Wild-catters have picked out certain small cities and are promoting stock selling schemes, promising to make them second Hollywoods," Barnard informed EDITOR & PUBLISHER.

"We now have under investigation a certain group operating along these lines on a large scale in a Southern state. This group has even established its own newspaper. Older and respectable dailies turned down their copy as fraudulent and deceptive.

"Other advertising frauds in the moving picture field which we are now smoking out are those alleged schools for moving picture actors and actresses and scenario writers.

"Many of these so-called schools claim connection with large moving picture concerns which is absolutely unfounded. Their advertising will be effectively stopped.

"Our new policy of co-operative investigation will greatly strengthen the machinery of the Better Business Bureaus," Barnard said.

The new plan of specialized investigation was formally adopted by the conference because of the marked success of the Better Business Bureau Commission's drive this year against fraudulent furniture advertising, Barnard said.

The organization will as separate bureaus continue handling local and small cases of deceptive advertising as before, but co-operation will be demanded on at least one particular investigation yearly. The full scope of the 1925 drive is to be determined later.

Letters have been dispatched to heads of the various member bureaus under Barnard's signature, seeking suggestions as to what one field of advertising the movement may be best directed, in addition to radio and the moving pictures.

The suggestions received will be tabulated and that field for which the strongest preference is shown will be chosen for unified operation and investigation.

Meanwhile, the commission's effort against furniture abuses will be continued together with drives, now underway.

Barnard was extremely optimistic over the present advertising situation and the "Truth in Advertising" movement despite the evils disclosed at Los Angeles.

"Advertising is becoming cleaner and more worthy of belief each year," he declared.

"This is particularly true in the retail field and in the advertisements of fabrics. There is a decided diminution in the number of camouflaged trade names.

"The conference showed that between $600,000 and $700,000 was spent this last year by Better Business Bureaus to keep advertising free from fraud and misrepresentations.

"Our campaign against fraud in the furniture field was particularly successful. The leading furniture manufacturers and a certain number of furniture dealers have co-operated with us and we are making real progress.

"We have filed a large number of complaints with the Federal Trade Commission against disreputable furniture firms.

"We have evolved proper furniture standards and have had our rule accepted, which requires that all the woods used in furniture be named. That is, if a piece is birch with mahogany finish, both woods must be used in advertisements printed describing it."

As a comprehensive summary of the present Better Business Bureau status, Mr. Barnard called attention to the report of Herbert S. Houston, chairman of the board of trustees of the National Vigilance Committee. This report follows in part:

"The oil frauds so effectively cleaned up in Forth Worth and Los Angeles are much less conspicuous than a year ago. It is the plan of the National Vigilance Committee shortly to enter into the field of cases involving substitution of oil and gasoline on the part of companies advertising standard products but selling the substitute article.

"We are happy to report that with a fairly adequate staff to handle the tremendous volume of work we are conducting our investigations. Thirty-eight Bureaus are now in operation, the two most recent additions being Scranton, Pa., and Springfield, Mass.

"These Bureaus were organized by the National Vigilance Committee in co-operation with local interests and the policy has been adopted to prescribing certain conditions which must be adopted in order to obtain recognition in the National chain. This policy has resulted in bringing into being Bureaus which are healthy at the outset and which therefore have not only the chance, but the logical possibility of growing to be real powers in their respective communities."

Other officers elected at the conference besides Barnard were Edward L. Green of Boston, vice president, and William P. Green of New York, secretary-treasurer. In addition to these officials other members of the corporation's board of governors are now F. M. Willson, Toledo; George S. Kahin, Seattle; Harry W. Riehl, St. Louis, and G. F. Olwin, Indianapolis.

THE ADVERTISING SITUATION TODAY AS DISCLOSED BY BETTER BUSINESS BUREAUS

Fraudulent advertising of the radio and moving picture industries are now being attacked.

Stock selling frauds in the moving picture field and so-called schools for actors and actresses and scenario writers are under investigation.

A new plan of specialized investigation has been formulated to meet existing deceptive advertising evils.

Between $600,000 and $700,000 was spent last year by Better Business Bureaus to keep advertising free from fraud and misrepresentation.

A successful campaign has been waged against fraud in furniture advertising.

The retail field has been cleaned up and there is a decided diminution in the number of camouflaged trade names in the advertisements of fabrics.

Fraudulent oil advertising in Fort Worth and Los Angeles has been effectively eliminated.

Thirty-eight Better Business Bureaus are now in operation, the two most recent additions being Scranton, Pa., and Springfield, Mass.

Act Against Fake Ad Solicitors

Retail merchants of Palestine, Tex., have taken action to protect themselves from the operations of fake and worthless solicitors for advertising matter. A secret vigilance committee of three men from the Palestine Business League and the Palestine Retail Merchants' Association has been appointed to examine and pass upon every project for solicitation of advertising matter or funds in Palestine. Every solicitor who seeks to operate in Palestine must have a permit from this committee.

NEWSPRINT CUT PROBABLE

President Timmins of St. Lawrence Mills Discusses Situation

The probability of a reduction in the price of newsprint was discussed by N. A. Timmins, president of the St. Lawrence Paper Mills at the annual general meeting held in Montreal, Tuesday. Even with newsprint reduced a few dollars a ton, he was satisfied "there would be quite enough in it for us to carry on and make a good showing."

From a Canadian standpoint an embargo on the export of pulpwood would be a good and desirable thing, Timmins declared in the course of an informal discussion. By embargo he did not mean absolute prohibition, but an import of a few dollars a cord which would be gradually increased until the profit from this important source of wealth came into the hands of those who should benefit from it. A tax imposed for a few years would give American pulp mills time to adjust themselves to new conditions.

Mr. Timmins plea for some action in solving this pulpwood problem was seconded by Ernest Rossiter, general manager of the company, who urged that newsprint manufacturers meet and formulate a policy, presenting a unitd front on the question. He strongly criticized the work of the Pulpwood Commission, saying that what it had done could have been accomplished by a few business men consulting records.

Executive Committee Votes Budget of $295,411 at New York Meet—Hunt Renamed Manager—Committees Appointed

Business of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World for the fiscal year was set in motion this week when the executive committee held sessions at the Advertising Club of New York. Lou Holland, A. A. C. W. president, presided.

CARL HUNT

Budgets totaling $295,411 were voted; Carl Hunt was reappointed general manager; date of the Houston 1925 convention was changed from May 17 to May 10-14; and various committees were appointed to carry on the year's work.

The budget for the general fund, operating, educational, club organization, and similar activities, called for the expenditure of $136,261, while that for the vigilance fund, pertaining to the work of the National Vigilance Committee, and its co-operation with the local Better Business Bureaus and volunteer Vigilance Committees of the country, was for $159,150.

Hunt showed that these budgets were based upon a conservative estimate of income, in view of the experience of the last fiscal year, ending June 1.

Hunt also showed that the Association had ended the last fiscal year (May 31) in better condition than ever before in its history, with $37,427 cash in hand as against $9,730 last year, and with total assets of $143,914 as against $85,144 the year before, and with a surplus of $83,261 as compared with $41,742 the year before.

The biggest increase in the budget for vigilance work relates to the investigation department. New men are to be added in that field.

The Committee voted an additional $2,000 for the budget of the National Educational Committee, to be employed for the promotion of church advertising.

President Holland was authorized to appoint a National Program Committee to have charge of the program at Houston, an On-to-Houston Committee to promote attendance, and a Committee on Constitution and By-Laws.

John H. Logeman, of Chicago, was appointed chairman of the National Exhibit Committee, to have charge of the advertising exhibit at the Houston Convention.

Herbert S. Houston, of New York, was reappointed chairman of the Association's Publications Committee; Paul T. Cherington, chairman of the National Educational Committee; George W. Hopkins, chairman of the Speakers Bureau; and Frederick M. Feiker, chairman of the Committee on Associated Advertising, the organ of the Associated Advertising Clubs.

James Wright Brown, publisher of EDITOR & PUBLISHER, was appointed chairman of a special committee to cooperate with the National Golden Rule Committee of Near East Relief, in connection with the co-operation of Advertising Clubs and other advertising organizations in helping to promote International Golden Rule Sunday, Dec. 7, 1924.

Reuben H. Donnelley, of Chicago, Samuel C. Dobbs, Atlanta, Rowe Stewart, Philadelphia, W. C. D'Arcy, St. Louis, and E. D. Gibbs, Dayton, were appointed as a President's Advisory Committee.

The Executive Committee adopted a strong resolution endorsing the work which the Motion Picture Producers and Distributors of America, Incorporated, had been doing toward raising the standards of advertising the motion picture industry.

The Committee voted the Window Display Advertising Association and the National Publishers Association into membership as departments of the National Advertising Commission, affiliated with the A. A. C. W.

"On-to-Houston" Committee Named

The "On-to-Houston Committee" of the Advertising Club of New York was announced this week as follows: Herman Halsted, of Paul Block, Inc., chairman; Earle Pearson, educational director, A. A. C. W.; P. B. Alexander, Crowell Publishing Company; Fred P. Motz, John E. Branham & Co.; and David Lee of Lee & Williamson.

Hearst Approves Memorial Plans

William Randolph Hearst has approved the plans for the Hearst Hall, University of California to be dedicated in memory of his mother, Phoebe Apperson Hearst. The building, which is donated by the publisher, will be equipped on a much larger scale than the original hall destroyed by fire two and a half years ago. Surveys for a site will begin immediately.

Brooklyn Eagle Opens Job Plant

The Brooklyn Eagle officially opened its enlarged commercial printing department Sept. 18. Invitations were issued to inspect the machinery in the new 7-story building. Buffet luncheon was served between 12:30 and 5 o'clock in the afternoon.

NEW TABLOIDS IN NEW YORK AND MONTREAL

Morning Sun Shines Over Canadian City, While Macfadden's Graphic, Under "Truth" Banner, Gives New York First Person Tales of Love, Beauty and Sudden Death

THE tabloid invasion sweeps on. During the week, the metropolis saw the birth of a third "half-fold" daily, New York Evening Graphic, six-day, published by Bernarr Macfadden, famous apostle of physical culture and successful magazine publisher.

News came from Montreal that a sixteen-page picture and tabloid newspaper, under the name of the Morning Sun, had been established by the Montreal Sun Publishing Company. John H. Roberts, publisher of The Axe and the Sunday Sun, is president. Frank R. Clarke, a former editor of the Montreal Witness, is managing editor and Leslie H. Roberts, son of John H. Roberts, is business manager.

Announcement was made that the first issue of the Newark Press, Newark, N. J., J. J. Fiske publisher, scheduled for September 15, had been delayed owing to difficulties in press installation.

The United States now has a total of eight tabloid dailies, established since June 26, 1919, when Col. R. R. McCormick and Capt. J. M. Patterson, co-editors and publishers of Chicago-Tribune, founded New York Daily News which today enjoys the largest circulation of any daily newspaper in America, the last official three-months' audit showing an average sale of 720,862 copies for the six-day morning paper and 662,142 for the Sunday morning issue.

Following is a list of the daily tabloid papers of the country:

New York—Daily News; Daily Mirror, published by the Hearst Organization; Graphic.

Boston—Advertiser, Hearst publication.

Baltimore—Post, Scripps-Howard publication.

Washington—News, Scripps-Howard publication.

Los Angeles—News, Cornelius Vanderbilt, Jr., publication.

San Francisco—Herald, Cornelius Vanderbilt publication.

Five tabloid newspapers have been started and suspended through lack of public support, as follows: Baltimore Times, Detroit Ledger, St. Louis American, Boston Record, Chicago Day-Book. Two standard-form dailies, Des Moines News and Seattle Union-Record, for a short time tried tabloid form, returning to the standard size.

News, pictures, opinion and entertainment proportions of all the tabloids vary, but all are an adaptation of the huge circulating tabloid picture dailies of London, of which there are three: Daily Graphic, Daily Mirror and Daily Sketch. All have as a basic element brevity in news recital.

Cornelius Vanderbilt, Jr., has announced he will start a "string" of tabloid dailies, perhaps eight, and that he would invade Detroit next. Tabloids have been discussed for many cities, and following the success of New York Daily News the small forms threatened to break out in first class cities of the country like mushrooms in a pasture after a spring storm. As the subject was studied, however, it was discovered that there is a very special technique in tabloid editing, as well as advertising and circulation methods, and the tabloid enthusiasts came to the conclusion that such enterprises are not without speculative elements.

Bernarr Macfadden entered the New York field with a fanfare of advertising in other newspapers, which, like his first announcement in EDITOR & PUBLISHER, promised a newspaper novelty nothing short of startling. Many established newspaper practices were discountenanced or repudiated in these promises. Particularly, the Graphic was to be a wholesome and entirely constructive journal, fit for the home. It would not exploit "crime" news nor heroize the lowest elements of society.

The first issue, coming on Monday from the former New York Evening Mail plant, near City Hall park, which Mr. Macfadden purchased from Frank A. Munsey, is said to have represented a total run in excess of 300,000.

First page typography was interesting, but not perfectly organized, and the news treatment was remarkable. "Nothing But the Truth" was the slogan. The displayed banner line read: "Hero Saves Pals In Blast," and the story was told in six lines of eight-point italics, followed by two-thirds of a column labeled "By Foreman Philip Brady, as told to a Graphic reporter." The news concerned the act of the foreman in rescuing three workmen from an excavation where an explosion had occurred. The story was routine news in other offices.

In the late edition of the Graphic of Monday there was a three-column wedding picture of a New York artist and an English baronet and a story, the like of which has not been seen in New York, at least in a lead position. It was "By Mrs. Clifford, Who has known the bride for a long time and has been housekeeper at the studio apartment in 34 East 51st street." It was all about whether a woman can marry and still hold to her career in art, and if it was written, as represented, by Mrs. Clifford, a house-keeper, she has cultivated the newspaper idiom to a nicety.

As the pages of the Graphic unfolded it became manifest that the first person singular was the approved news form. "I know the Man Who Killed My Brother," was a five-column banner in 72 point, and the story was "By Mrs. Minnie Nunamacher, of Jersey City. "Friends Dragged me in Gutter," "I know Man Who Killed My Girl," "We Faced Death Together in Flames," "Must I Die Because I am a Poor Boy?" "I am Now the Mother of My Sister's Son," "I am Old, Poor, But Keep Your Charity," were other first person singular head-lines displayed in the issues of Monday and Tuesday, each proclaiming a "by-line" story, ostensibly written by a principal or some authority, however obscure. In instances the first person singular was used over a news despatch without any quotation for a base, as in the case of the line "I am Now the Mother of My Sister's Son," written over a despatch reciting such circumstances, but with no interview to support it. It made a rattling good headline, but the story was disappointing.

In the second number of the Graphic a notice appeared on page one, saying: "The Graphic is not interested in presenting the grim details of the murder (a New Jersey case) as such. It is interested in the speedy solution of crimes of this nature in order to bring criminals to justice."

On the same page all the pictures, six in number, concerned persons, victims or principals, in murder cases, including one of Leopold and Loeb in court, the lead stories on both sides of the page were crime stories, and four of the seven remaining stories, in minor display, on page one were conventional crime stories. In space, on page one of that issue, only three inches did not relate to either murder or rum running. In fact, except for the "by-line" treatment of the news, wherein the intelligence of house-keepers, foremen and any person in the street who might be a witness in a case, was substituted for the discriminating writing of a trained reporter, the initial numbers of the Graphic indicated no remarkable innovation as regards either the selection of news or its treatment. It was a sensational newspaper.

The early numbers of the new tabloid exhibited some fair to ordinary illustrations, a considerable number of half-column portraits, a double-truck of news pictures, many of which seemed to us as unfortunate selections for the premier numbers of a newspaper so heavily devoted to pictures. The job did not appear to be expertly handled, and doubtless will improve.

There was an unique and sensational top-page half-tone strip labelled "The Graphic's Daily Photo Drama From Life." Some story from real-life is selected and four or five photographs are made to illustrate it. These photographs evidently are the work of movie actors responding to some director who has a stock of properties in a studio. "She killed for Love: Will the Law Forgive Her?" is one title, and the excellent photographs tell the story, aided by ample cut-lines, of a Polish writer who ordered his wife to murder him, thus to escape a lingering illness. She is shown shooting him as he lies in bed. "Murderess," said the law, and the final picture shows her kneeling in the shadow of the guillotine.

Other features are a page of sport pictures, several comic strips, radio program, stock market discussion without quotations, a daily sermon, how to play a ukulele, a full page of editorials with some good, plain-language writing, Broadway gossip by Walter Winchell, reviews of plays by selected persons not of the theatre instead of by a critic, movie news, physical culture by Mr. Macfadden, and others, a love diary, bedtime story, cute kid sayings, sporting cartoon by Thornton Fisher, human interest cartoons by Ryan Walker, back page editorial by Mr. Macfadden, a woman's feature by Mrs. Macfadden and a run of illustrated news-features.

Two or more pages are given to peppery fiction. For a newspaper that has stressed its moral qualifications, the fiction story called "The Romance of an Artist's Model" naturally draws comment.

In plain language the heroine, at 16, is depicted as forming a "great and splendid love" for the son of the town's richest man. "He lifted her out of the rut of her life," the story goes, "and in return she gave herself to him." It is discovered that they "must be married at once." The young man "honorably volunteers" to take her to another town and wed her. His high-powered car is wrecked, he is killed, she is shocked and the doctor attending her announces: "You needn't worry, kid. You are not going to have a baby. The accident—" The girl is made to say: "The mere fact that my poor dead Rob and I violated the moral code of Mapleton did not, in the least, mean that we did not respect it."

A picture of a girl in bathing costume was shown large on the back page of the first number. Readers were told that this personable young woman, in street costume, would travel about in the subway looking for courteous men who would yield their seats. "If you can pick her out on a subway train she will see that the Graphic rewards you." When she sees a courteous gentleman she gives him a card, inviting him to call at the office and get a premium.

Many years ago in New York a variation of this stunt was stopped by the police because impudent youths were using the license to speak to women car

I Cried for Joy at News From Sing Sing

By Mrs. Cecile Scheuer

Who labored for months to obtain money for Jernatowski. (Picture on Page 16.)

As soon as I heard that Michael's life had been spared I just sat down and cried for joy. The commutation is the culmination of efforts initiated last June to save a man who was largely the victim of circumstances, whose environment never allowed him a chance. And I am happy, oh, very happy, to have been instrumental in saving the life of an innocent man. That is the greatest thing any one can do—save a life.

One of the most effective instrumentalities in the effort to procure commutation was a picture of Michael working as a painter and decorator. He was working under the name of Schwartz for a master painter in Buffalo. But his employer came forward and identified him, and so proved that Michael was in no way connected with the mail strike in which the crime had its genesis.

Michael's family always was poor. He was one of a family that comprised three sons and three daughters. At the outset I felt that Michael had possibilities for good in the world possibilities that were never altered to materialize by the circumstances of his life. He simply never had a chance.

"Iron Mike" Jernatowski. "I'd Be Different," He Declared, "If I Had a Chance to Live."

Would Have Kicked Off With Grin

Resigned after many heavy-hearted months in the gloom of Sing Sing's death house to forfeit their lives in the electric chair tonight, two youths convicted of murder were snatched back from the brink of eternity by a Governor's mercy today.

The death sentences of "Iron Mike" Jernatowski and Francis Marion were commuted to life imprisonment by Gov. Alfred E. Smith on what the two doomed men thought would be their last day on earth.

In a vivid, dramatic human interview the two condemned men, a few minutes before the glad news of the commutation was brought to them told a visitor the sordid stories of their lives.

This visitor, a social worker, consented to tell her story to a GRAPHIC reporter.

Pine Caskets Ready

With two pine caskets in a corner of the death room not 100 feet away, awaiting their bodies, the youthful man, convicted of first-degree murder poured forth to her their pitiful tale of human lives wrecked and twisted by fate.

Iron Mike was sentenced to death as a result of the killing of Mrs. Katherine Hanover of Buffalo, slain by a stray bullet during a pistol duel in that city during a railroad strike. Jernatowski has consistently maintained his innocence.

"I'd be different if I had a chance to live," he told the visitor, shortly after both men had received the last rites from the chaplain, who so soon was to bring them the word for which they had long since given up all hope. "I was trying to make up for my past when I was framed.

His wife still filled with the emotion caused by saying goodby to her mother, who had come for what she believed the last time she would see him.

Mental Hell in Death House

Marion told of the "mental hell" he said he had undergone while in the death house. He had admitted killing his wife in her New York home in the heat of anger.

"If the men who say men must die for crimes had to go through it waiting day after day to have your life taken," he said, "they would not be so hasty with their verdicts."

Kick Off With a Grin

But in his try to kick off with a grin" were among the last words

Startling front page art characterizes the Graphic, which has also shown a liking for news of criminals eluding capital punishment. A typical "first person" story appears at the bottom of the page—illustrated.

NO MORE DEALINGS WITH WIRE UNION CANADIAN NEWSPAPERS SAY

Morkrum Machines Will Replace Canadian Press Operators Who Struck After Refusing Arbitration—News Only Slightly Curtailed

THE act of the union press telegraphers of Canada in repudiating an arbitration clause in their contract with the Canadian Press and declaring a strike intended to tie up telegraph communication among 106 newspapers, occurring on September 11, has been met by the management of the press service and its newspaper clients by a refusal to consider further negotiations with the union. It is declared as the future policy of the organization that employes shall be dealt with as individuals only.

The strike did not tie up communications, it is announced by J. F. B. Livesay, general manager of the Canadian Press, who made the further declaration that his organization had entered into a contract with the Morkrum Company, of Chicago, for a complete installation of automatic telegraph printers. By these means the news will be delivered to clients, and also exchanged through sending and receiving instruments on the circuits maintained by the association. This system, which is in use on various circuits of the press services of the United States, dispenses with the Morse operator, but employs, for sending purposes, a so-called "puncher," who is in reality a typist, requiring no greater degree of skill than that of the ordinary stenographer. The "punchers" have been organized in the United States by the telegraphers' union in shops recognizing the union, but as little skill is required they are easily replaced.

According to news reaching EDITOR & PUBLISHER the strike has meant to the Canadian dailies merely a slight tightening of the volume of news, condensation of reports, without any instance of the omission of an important happening. Three methods have been employed by the Canadian Press to supply the newspapers without the use of the Morse keys.

As a basis, telegraphic service itself between C. P. offices in New York, Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver has been maintained uninterruptedly by the company's superintendent. Supplementing this the telephone has been utilized to excellent advantage, a regular service between C. P. and member officers being operated day and night. A third medium has been the radio. Members owning broadcasting stations have placed them at the disposal of the C. P. and news has been transmitted to the smaller dailies in the surrounding country at stated intervals.

In a statement to EDITOR & PUBLISHER, Mr. Livesay said that this organization was well satisfied with the situation and particularly pleased with the number of messages received from members throughout the Dominion congratulating the management on its stand.

"This is not a wage dispute" explained Mr. Livesay. "The wage issue faded in to the background when the Commercial Telegraphers' Union of America deliberately broke its agreement with this company and called a strike at 24 hours' notice. The rock on which union agreements are founded is the sanctity of the contract.

"Four years ago the Canadian Press entered into an agreement with the Commercial Telegraphers' Union of America which was designed to be of a permanent character and an arbitration clause was deliberately included to take care of such a dispute as the new wage scale. That is the company's contention. When the men's committee denied this, the company offered to arbitrate the interpretation of that same arbitration clause, to which they had a clear right. This also the men refused, as they also refused to avail themselves of the Conciliation Board appointed by the Department of Labor at Ottawa. The Canadian Press therefore can make no further agreement with an international union that does not respect its contract.

"We are doing very nicely" continued Mr. Livesay. "Since the men quit work last Thursday we have carried on our news services uninterruptedly and day by day they are increasing in volume and efficiency. We are engaged now in converting the Canadian Press from a man or Morse operated news service to a machine operated news service and for this purpose have concluded contracts with Morkrum Company of Chicago. This plant is in process of being installed at all strategic points."

The following announcement appeared in some Canadian newspapers: "The Canadian Press has arranged to use the Toronto Daily Star's broadcasting plant, CFCA, at stated intervals during the day for delivering a news service to such Canadian Press members as its range may reach, including specially the territory west from Belleville to London. These periods will be Eastern standard time as follows: 10:30 a. m.; 12 noon, and 1:30 p.m. Copy will be prepared and filed by Canadian Press editors and despatched by the Star radio operator.

"J. F. B. LIVESAY, General Manager."

Pattison Leaving Scranton Republican

W. J. Pattison, general manager and part owner of the Scranton (Pa.) Republican has sold his interest in that paper to Col. L. A. Watres, and will sever connections with the daily December 1, to become affiliated with another publishing enterprise. Conditions surrounding the new enterprise do not permit of a detailed statement at this time, he declared. L. B. Tyler now assistant general manager will succeed Pattison. The retiring general manager has been connected with the Republican almost 10 years. He was for many years publisher and treasurer of the New York Evening Post.

Printing Firm and Daily Merged

A syndicate headed by Claude E. Towner has purchased the Monangahela (Pa.) Republican and the Zimmer Printery and will merge the two concerns. Work has been started on a new building. The new owners, who have obtained a Pennsylvania charter with a capital of $100,000, will assume charge of the plant Oct. 1. Mr. Towner will be general manager and editorial director while Harry T. Zimmerman will be business manager.

THE ANSWERS EDITOR

She sits all day with pencil poised,
She thinks and thinks, and racks her brain
To find some way to soften love
And ease a wretched victim's pain.
Upon her desk are stacked the woes
Of loved and unloved, crossed and crazed—
A mass of problems rising till
No wonder even she is dazed!

Who knows the stabs of Cupid's darts
As she who diagnoses grief?
Who knows as she that thorny way
Of agonies beyond belief?
Into her sanctum pours the stream
Unending, from the loved and lost—
A fevered pile of fervid stuff,
Of broken hearts by fortune tossed!

And so she sits, and sits and sits,
And so she thinks, and thinks and dreams;
And so she reads and reads and reads
Till tears of pity run in streams!
And so all day, with pencil poised,
She racks her brain, she strains her eyes,
She who must hear love's moaning voice
And find some way to sympathize!

Outside the hurly-burly world
Goes on its way with headlong rush,
Nor heeds the sacred silences
Where broken-hearted lovelorn gush!
And she who sits and thinks and dreams
From day to day, from day to day—
By gosh, if anybody does,
She earns her pay, she earns her pay!

A. P. ADDS TO BERLIN STAFF

Louis Lochner Sails Sept. 20 to Report German News

Louis P. Lochner sails Saturday this week on the S. S. Cleveland to become a regular member of the Berlin staff of the Associated Press. He has been in this country since August 10, having come here from Berlin, where he was temporarily assisting in the A. P. office.

For five years he was international secretary of the International Federation of Students, and in consequence editor of the association's organ, Cosmopolitan Student. He has spent considerable time in Europe studying European conditions.

At various times he has been connected with the Milwaukee Free-Press, the Madison (Wis.) Capital Times, and the Madison (Wis.) State Journal.

BARGAIN DAY FAVORED BY CIRCULATORS

But Pacific Northwest Managers Frown On Premium Lures at Spokane Meet—Eugene, Ore., Chosen for 1925

"Bargain days" for newspapers as a means of boosting circulations were advocated at the annual convention of the Pacific Northwest Circulation Managers' Association held September 11 and 12 in Spokane, Wash. The subject was discussed by David H. Smith of the Portland, Oregon Journal, and met with general approval.

Mr. Smith declared the bargain day idea one of the best circulation getters when properly handled. He advocated using advertising, circular letters and other publicity methods to get the idea before the people. Mr. Smith insisted that newspapers should be sold on their merits rather than on a premium basis. A majority of those attending the convention concurred in the statement that too many prizes and premiums were being offered.

The association chose Eugene, Ore., as the next meeting place, sometime in March or April, the date to be set coincident with the convention of the Oregon Press Association. No election of officers was held.

High class carriers are not as difficult to obtain as in the past and there has been much improvement in this respect, C. H. Breed, of the Spokane Spokesman-Review declared.

The California code of reference for those applying for positions was adopted upon motion of E. P. Hopwood of the Portland Oregonian.

Short papers were also read by the following: Howard Parish, Seattle Star; J. M. Dunning, Pendleton East Oregonian; J. E. Turnbull, Eugene, Ore.; Ellis B. Hall, Centralia Chronicle; C. H. Breed, Spokesman-Review; Frank Garrison, Seattle Post-Intelligencer; W. R. Woodward, Everett Herald; Osgood Packard, Seattle Times; E. P. Hopwood, Portland Oregonian; H. L. McDuffie, Spokane Chronicle; S. S. Smith, Medford Mail Tribune and Sun; P. P. Foelkner, Aberdeen.

Present officers of the association are: C. H. Breed, Spokane Spokesman-Review, president; David H. Smith, Portland Oregon Journal, vice-president; E. P. Hopwood, Portland Oregonia, secretary-treasurer; J. C. Adams, Boise Statesman, and W. D. Lynes, Tacoma News-Tribune, directors.

PUBLIC DEMANDING INTERPRETATIVE NEWS

Huge Sums Now Being Spent to Cover Events in Remote Places of the World, Karl Bickel, United Press Chief Declares—Speed Must Increase to Compete With Radio

By WARREN BASSETT

THE nation was mildly amused when the newspapers printed news of the world fliers under the date line—'Ice Tickle, Labrador."

"Sounds like a new soft drink," was the comment, and that was all.

But to newspaper men it had a deeper signifigance.

It symbolized the amazing thoroughness with which press associations and individual newspapers are covering the news today—a thoroughness which has come to be accepted by the public as a matter of course, but which was undreamed of 20 or 25 years ago.

Wherever news breaks today it is covered. The newspapers demand it—the press associations comply. It does not matter that the scene of the story is a tiny fishing village in Iceland, or a remote section of China virtually cut off from commounication with the outside world—the newspapers must have the news.

Spot news is the demand, and the demand is increasing. Expense is disregarded. Feats of news gathering which would have been greeted with astonishment 15 years ago tread on each other's heels today and are accepted with scarcely a comment.

Karl A. Bickel, president of the United Press Associations and keen student of news trends and methods, was asked to discuss the present situation for EDITOR & PUBLISHER. He brought out the fact that the increasing demand for spot news is not merely the result of better transmission facilities, but a widened interest on the part of newspaper publishers and the public in world events.

"The world war is chiefly responsible for the present tremendous interest in world affairs," he declared. "The war pushed back news horizons infinite distances.

"We realize today that a happening at some far off point may directly affect us. When Chang Tso Lin declared war in China recently all the newspapers wanted the news. Not only a brief item that fighting had started, but an interpretative story explaining the meaning of the conflict, the motives and issues behind it, laid down on the telegraph desks day by day. To give this we sent a man to Mukden last week.

"World news is being covered more thoroughly today than at any previous time. Not only the big stories of the day but the events of lesser importance. For instance, the women's tennis matches at Wimbledon, which were merely preliminary to the Olympic contests. They were not highly important, but it cost the press associations approximately $100 a day in cable tolls to furnish the story of the matches to the newspapers of the country.

"And the Olympic games. Each event, regardless of whether American athletes were prominent, was covered as fully as though it took place in Newark. Cable tolls mounted to nearly $1,000 a day. But the meet was covered completely and accurately. And the public ate it up.

"The trips of Firpo from South America to the United States have proven a meal ticket to the All-America cables. Long daily stories were filed not only by the press associations but special correspondents to supply the demand for news.

"The Democratic convention in New York was covered probably more completely than any previous poltical gathering, and at an expense to the press associations of approximately $30,000.

"When the Titanic sank in 1913 a newspaper spent $10,000 to cover the story. This was broadcast as an astonishingly expensive news feat. That was a tremendous story—but it is common today to spend from $3,000 to $5,000 to cover events not one-tenth as important.

"Covering the world fliers across Iceland and Greenland was a difficult and expensive task. The cost has not yet been estimated but I understand the radio rate will total 21 cents a word. And seldom was the world flight the dominating news story of the day."

Where is the increasing demand for spot news coming from—newspaper publishers or newspaper readers? President Bickel was asked.

"Where is the demand for balloon tires coming from?" was his answer.

But he did not leave the question hanging.

KARL A. BICKEL

"The war pushed back news horizons infinite distances."

"World news is being covered more thoroughly today than at any previous time. Not only the big stories, but events of lesser importance."

"We must be more than mere collectors of news—we must weigh and interpret its significance."

"Inch by inch radio is edging into the business of news distribution, but I do not believe newspapers have much to fear."

"I would say the newspaper publishers are demanding more news in order to make better newspapers," he went on. "Newspaper readers in the United States are the most exacting in the world, and for that reason we have the best newspapers in the world. Show me an outstanding newspaper in England, France or any other country, and I will show you an American paper which is better."

Bickel does not foresee a time when a more leisurely spirit will permeate the business of news gathering. Speed and more speed will always be the demand of the American press. But he sees a change in the treatment of news stories.

"There is an increasing demand for interpretative news," he stated. "The fact alone is not sufficient. The events leading up to the fact and the events which it may precipitate must be told. We must be more than mere collectors of news. We must weigh and interpret its significance—for that is what the public is demanding. The simple news of a riot in the streets of Berlin in which people are killed no longer makes an impression. Unless the reasons behind it and the possible consequences are told it is virtually meaningless.

"The newspapers and press associations of the United States are already the fastest news collectors in the world. But that speed will have to be increased to compete with radio.

"Inch by inch radio is edging into the business of news distribution. This was never so graphically illustrated as in connection with the Democratic National Convention. Extra editions rushed from New York to suburban towns carrying the 71st ballot would reach the newsstands just as the complete report of the 80th ballot was coming over the loud speaker. The editions were old before they arrived.

"The results of big sports contests are now known instantaneously via radio. However, in spite of these instances, I do not believe the newspapers have much to fear. The publication of extras, of course, is even now affected. But radio can never give the complete news report of the day as the newspapers can give it.

"Radio is an imperative thing. Like the newspaper it cannot be laid aside and picked up in a moment of leisure. You miss the event if you are not at the loud speaker as it is being broadcast. And even then you get only the fact. The newspapers are read for color and interpretation. With big news being flashed by radio, newspaper publishers will no longer have the obligation of going extra to give the public the news. More time and effort can be spent on improving details and interpreting the facts.

"Personally I think the American Telephone & Telegraph Company and the Radio Corporation of America are carrying news almost against their own desires in order to gratify the popular demand. Press associations are heavy clients of both companies and I am convinced they do not intend to encroach upon our business. But radio has come to stay and inevitably it will carry news matter."

Will press associations enter the radio field by erecting their own broadcasting stations for the distribution of news?

Not in the immediate future, President Bickel stated. Popular radio telephony is still an infant industry of only three years' growth, in his opinion, and has by no means exhausted the possibilities of its development. Changes in apparatus and technique are being made with frequency. Experiment still dominates the industry. It would be silly to set down any limit to radio at present, according to Bickel, but today the telephonic art is not developed or adapted to general practical use for press association news transmission.

Leaving the subject of radio, President Bickel was asked to discuss the interest in American news abroad since the war in comparison with the increased interest in foreign news in the United States.

"There is an even greater proportionate interest in American news abroad since the war," he said. "The people of the world are more keenly interested in America today than ever before. America is the repository of the world's credit—and the world is very much interested in money.

"The United Press is serving a world-wide news report to more than 50 large newspapers in Europe, as well as several European press associations, such as the official Russian Telegraphy Agency, the Exchange Telegraph of London, Radio Agency of France, British United Press. In the Far East we serve the Nippon Dempo Tsushin Sha Ltd., the leading news agency of Japan.

"The increase in American news interest in South America is well known. Seventy-five per cent of the largest papers of South America receive United Press dispatches daily. We directly serve more than 30 newspapers in China and the Philippines, as well as 175 in Australia through the Australian Press Association.

"The American world-wide distribution of news is becoming a great industry—as far flung as the international distribution of American oil or harvesters, even exceeding in some respects the distribution of American automobiles. It is constantly growing and developing, and its possibilities are endless."

Now 42, the president of the United Press Association has been a student of news since his high school days in Geneseo, Ill., his home town. During his senior year he acted as news editor of the Geneseo Daily Arena. But it was on the Davenport (Ia.) Times, where he put in 16 hours a day reporting for the salary of $9 a week that he received his most valuable experience, he declared.

"Personally, I believe work on a small daily in a town of twelve or fifteen thousand, is the best training in newspaper work a man can get," he said. "You get the full picture. You do all types of work. You are reporter, feature writer, and copy reader rolled in one. On the Davenport Times the staff was small. After the day's copy was in every man had to write a feature for use in the next day's paper.

"I believe in journalism schools, but I don't think I would advise a young man to take a strict journalism course. The general liberal arts course, with writing and literature featured, combined with electives in journalism is more valuable, its seems to me. Top this with a year's training on a small town daily and add natural talent, and you have the basis for a brilliant newspaper career."

After leaving the Davenport Times, Bickel went to California where he entered Leland Stanford University. He made his way through by doing special correspondence for newspapers.

When the United Press was organized he became first a district manager, then sales manager. His work was so effective he was made general manager, and more recently president of the organization.

CHAPTER NINETEEN

Mr. Bennett Threatened With Assassination—Again Castigates the Tribune and Ridicules the Journal of Commerce

ON November 21, 1856, the Herald printed the following letter from Charleston, S. C.:

"Charleston, S. C., November 17, 1856.

"To the Editor of the New York Herald,

"Dear Sir:

"I write merely to inform you of something of the utmost importance to you; which is simply this: that you and Horace Greeley will most assuredly be assassinated if you visit Washington during the meeting of Congress. I give you the above advice. If you see fit to profit by it, so well, so good."

At the writer's request, his name was withheld from publication, and Mr. Bennett treated the warning in a jocular vein as follows:

"This is dreadful, indeed. To be assassinated, no doubt with a gutta percha cane that will not break. The prospect is enough to make a man recommend his soul to God forthwith, and sign his will. We have no information as to Mr. Horace Greeley's intentions, nor can we say whether under such circumstances, he will venture to visit Washington. For ourselves, should business take us there, we fear we shall not gratify our assassins as fully as they might wish. It is our intention to make arrangements with the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations to keep the South Carolinians quiet, and as we know they are able to do so, we shall pursue our course with comparative composure."

While the Herald had advocated the protection of existing slave ownership under the terms of the Constitution, yet it strongly opposed the rash policy of the South Carolina "fire-eaters," who favored the reopening of the foreign slave trade and the obtaining of more raw labor from the shores of Africa for their vast plantations. It was his vehement opposition to this astounding scheme in defiance of the laws of God and man, that brought down upon him the wrath of many of the Southern planters.

J. C. Fremont's defeat for the Presidency was a great blow to the abolitionists, and Mr. Bennett held up their leaders to ridicule. He also criticised prominent clergymen for having entered the campaign and preaching "slanderous political sermons." After a severe slap at Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, of Plymouth Church, for his perversion of the truth as to Buchanan and the South, he referred to Rev. Dudley Tyng, who, having been "kicked out of his church for preaching a political sermon," had set up "an opposition conventicle. This is regular pious pluck and Beelzebub, with all other sinners, should immediately show their admiration for the parson, by becoming members of his new church. He's exactly in their line."

He blamed Greeley and the Tribune for Fremont's defeat.

The result of the Presidential election was a notable increase of hatred between the abolitionists and the defenders of the Southern slave owners. As Bennett bluntly put it, "Fremont's defeat has caused another furious flare-up over the niggers!" Referring to the Tribune as a supposedly innocent "sucking dove," but in reality an unscrupulous agitator for the destruction of the constitutional rights of the slave owners, he in a long article held up the abolitionists to scorn as "traitors" openly working for the ruin of the Union. This was but the beginning of a long and ferocious editorial conflict, in which both sides called each other hard names. The Tribune referred to Bennett and the Herald as "nigger drivers," and Bennett retorted that Greeley was a "nigger worshipper!"

Mr. Bennett kept himself well informed as to the condition of the Herald's contemporaries, and concerning the decline of the Weekly Tribune in circulation, said in September, 1857, "It represents no business want; it is the organ of no great interest, social, religious or political. People can breakfast, dine and sup with the most perfect equanimity without having perused the Weekly Tribune, though whether they can sleep without its aid is not quite so certain."

The elder Bennett, like his son did later, had a habit of omitting names of men who had incurred his displeasure, from stories in which they were the leading features, and on Oct. 5, 1857, the Tribune drew attention to a case of this kind as follows:

"The Herald boasts a good deal of its power, but it is a very weak and timid affair after all. It seems that it is now in such a narrow pass, that it can't safely print the name of the Hon. Daniel E. Sickles, even in its advertising columns. A political advertisement containing this formidable name was paid for at the Herald office the other evening, but when printed next morning, the name of Sickles had been struck out! The reason is that Sickles has prosecuted the editor of the Herald for libel. Now this is a poor and petty business, which no newspaper with a little serviceable brains in its editor's skull would be guilty of.

"There have been several signs lately that the Herald is falling into decrepitude, but this would seem to leave no doubt on the subject."

The Dred Scott Case

The decision by the U. S. Supreme Court in the famous Dred Scott case (1857), did much toward bringing on the Civil War, now dimly foreshadowed by Mr. Bennett. In brief the Court held that negroes were not citizens of the United States, and that a slave was not made free by being taken to a Free State and there maintained by his master.

The decision was spoken of in the Herald as "a bombshell, which will at once reopen the slavery agitation in all its length and breadth; henceforth slavery in the Territories is an issue which must be decided by the laws of climate, products, races, the natural growth of our population and immigration, for henceforth Congress can have nothing to do with the subject."

Greeley in the Tribune said: "While there is much to give us pain and to excite our apprehensions in the Dred Scott decision, we confess that no part of it more thoroughly stirs our indignation than that which at one stroke disfranchises all persons of color in the United States." Chief Justice Taney was compared to Jonah, and the decision was denounced as "not only a piece of detestable hyprocrisy and falsehood, but it is mean and skulking cowardice."

A day or two later, Bennett prophetically declared, in a long editorial, that "the black Republicans are preparing their platform for the great and terrible fight which is sure to come in 1860, and plunge us into a fearful conflict between the nigger worshippers and the nigger drivers, North and South."

CHAPTER TWENTY

THE embittered controversy between the Herald and the Tribune continued unceasingly and should be highly diverting to present day readers, divested of the rankling hatred generated by the serious problems then confronting the nation. Apparently Bennett had a little the best of it in his satirical attacks on Greeley, as, for instance, in 1859, when the latter started on his anti-slavery lecture tour, Bennett said:

"Greeley is running about the country delivering lectures at fifty dollars each. Dana and Ripley, managers and associates of the Tribune, are writing articles at $2 a page for Appleton's 'Cyclopædia.' These facts show that nigger worship is nearly at its close; that anti-slavery agitation is going down, and that whenever it becomes defunct, the Tribune's nigger circulation will collapse."

He also repeatedly warned his readers as to what he feared might happen if the coming Federal election should be won by the Republicans, referring, under the head of a "Foretaste of a Nigger Worshipping Administration," to a Republican soiree in Washington, where two colored guests had been the lions of the fete, and saying:

"Pompey and Sambo may now lift up their heads and exult; the good time is coming; the oppressed shall not only go free, but they shall eat boned turkey, drink champagne, flirt in quiet corners, participate in the 'German' and, like the boatman on la belle riviere, dance all night till broad daylight, and go home with the (white) gals in the morning!"

In a later editorial on the critical situation, the Herald said:

"The nigger worshippers of the North are working for the severance of the Union, and the nigger drivers and fire eaters of the South are laboring to accomplish the same result. They are all alike traitors to the Constitution and the Union, and doing their best to destroy this fair political fabric, raised by the wisdom and cemented by the blood of our forefathers."

It was also in 1859 that the proprietor of the Herald made his famous alliterative reference to "Buchanan, Bonaparte and Bennett," as the three great controlling forces.

Bennett and Greeley Compared

In a review of American journalism published in the New York Leader in 1859, the two great editors were compared as follows:

"The two most commanding editors are undoubtedly James Gordon Bennett and Horace Greeley, and without drawing comparisons to the advantage or detriment of either, it is enough to say that in each of them there is an idiosyncrasy which gives them such prominently distinctive traits as to attract and fix them in the public mind. It is difficult to conceive of two persons more unlike in thought and action. * * * It is impossible to express any idea more ludicrous than that of Bennett and Greeley under the same yoke.

"To Bennett the public owes its warmest thanks for taking the lead in the improvement of the American press; in energy, activity and every quality that gives interest to a daily paper."

Broadway—translated into language we understand

MANY dramatic critics in writing of the theater, lead the floundering reader into intricate paths of hyperbole, adjectives and invective English. We admit they are good and they make us inclined to believe they admit it themselves. But no matter how clever the reviewer, that sort of review leaves us without any definite impression of the play. We couldn't say whether we are for it or against it.

Burns Mantle is The Chicago Tribune's theater critic in New York. When he writes about a play, you know what he means. You know what the play is like. You can talk intelligently about it to your friend who has just come back from Broadway. You have a sane idea of the show, written in plain, though faultless, style, with a fine touch of natural humor sprinkled over the spots where humor is not out of place.

Burns Mantle's weekly letter from New York makes an ideal review for any newspaper. It has been coming to The Tribune for nearly 15 years and because of its exceptional worth is syndicated.

Mr. Mantle has long been one of the country's leading dramatic critics and his selection of the year's best plays, published annually, is recognized as the American authority on the subject.

No critic, we believe, can be more generally satisfactory than Burns Mantle. Why not pick him as your own dramatic critic on Broadway for the season that is just opening? A letter or wire will bring to you proofs and rates.

ROCKEFELLERS DISCLAIM PRESS PROBE—LEE

Publicity Agent Says Foundation Did Not Promise $170,000—Did Appropriate $2,500—Curious Controversy, But There Will Be No Funds From Oil Man

IVY L. LEE, publicity representative of the Rockefeller interests, with offices at 61 Broadway, New York, this week "authoritatively" announced that the Laura Spelman Rockefeller Memorial Foundation would not finance a movement by scientists, headed by Dr. H. A. Miller, of the University of Ohio, to investigate news and its sources.

The scientists' plans for this investigation, as exclusively revealed by Dr. William T. Ellis, in EDITOR & PUBLISHER two weeks ago, have obviously been upset by premature publicity or they were too sanguine of their funds, for Lee issued a statement calculated to repudiate the story and obliterate the suggestion that Rockefeller money had been, or would be, devoted to a movement which had as its purpose a press investigation.

Mr. Lee does not deny, but confirms, the published statement that Rockefeller money defrayed the expenses of the first meeting of the scientists in Washington in May, whereat Walter S. Rogers, of Washington, was chosen as organizing chairman and Dr. Miller as head investigator.

Just where the scientists expected to raise $170,000 to meet requirements of a budget they had prepared at their meeting, if not from the Rockefeller Memorial fund which had put up the money to bring them together, is not clear, but Lee is definite in his statement that the would-be investigators were not promised this money by John D. Rockefeller, Jr., or John D. Rockefeller, Sr., or any of the Rockefeller foundations, and he is positive beyond all doubt that if they expected Rockefeller money to the extent of $170,000 or any amount they will be disappointed as it will not be forthcoming.

Lee put the best energies of his press agency into operation this week to detach the name of Rockefeller from the project. He called Walter Rogers to his office for a conference. He prepared statements for every newspaper editor in the country. He declared Dr. Ellis' story in EDITOR & PUBLISHER was incorrect.

On the other, hand, EDITOR & PUBLISHER received from Dr. Miller, the man in working charge of the investigation, a voluntary letter in appreciation of Dr. Ellis' story as it appeared in the columns of this paper and asked for additional copies of the paper to send to friends. If EDITOR & PUBLISHER's report was incorrect or misleading, Dr. Miller did not notice it, but on the contrary commented favorably upon the story. His letter read:

"The copy of the title page of EDITOR & PUBLISHER for Sept. 6 interests me very much. It seems to me that Dr. Ellis' desire to launch the project favorably was carried out in this article. I have already received letters from people in various parts of the country, indicating that the article was widely quoted from."

Dr. William T. Ellis was equally positive that his story was correct and declared in a letter received on Thursday: "Every line of my story is substantiated by the written statements of Dr. H. A. Miller."

When EDITOR & PUBLISHER sought to get information from the fountain head, the Laura Spelman Rockefeller Foundation, it ran into difficulties that reporters of this generation have become familiar with. Dr. Beardsley Ruml, the official of the foundation appealed to, said he could not talk for publication, and referred the reporter to Ivy L. Lee, 61 Broadway.

Mr. Lee prepared a statement, later in the day, which he signed. It reduced the chief element in dispute to the question whether Dr. Miller and his associates had had any ground to expect financial support, in addition to the $2,500 which the Rockefeller institution admittedly granted to cover the expenses of the first steps of the investigation. Lee says there was no commitment. He tries to convey the impression that the $2,500 admitted Rockefeller grant to start the operation had no significance on the question whether Rockefeller money was backing the project. That was only for car-fare and clerk hire, but it organized the movement. Dr. Ellis is authority for the statement that he had been informed by Dr. Miller that a budget of $170,000 had been prepared at the May meeting and that the money would be "forthcoming as the work proceeds." Lee says there was no ground for expecting this to come from the Rockefeller institution.

Dr. Ellis wrote in EDITOR & PUBLISHER that a grant of $25,000 had already been made, in addition to the $2,500. Lee says this was not Rockefeller money, and quotes Rogers as having said that it was only tentatively promised by some foundation other than a Rockefeller institution. Dr. Miller was authority for the statement that the investigators had received a grant of $25,000 from "one foundation." The inference plainly was that this was Rockefeller money, but apparently that was a mistake. If not Rockefeller, what "foundation" did Dr. Miller refer to? That is unknown.

Lee declared that Dr. Ellis' story was misleading in that it indicated an investigation of the press as well as news sources, whereas the intention was, he said, only to investigate foreign news sources. But just how a "world-wide investigation" of the "gathering and dissemination of current news and opinion of international concern", as the formal plan adopted in May admittedly promised, could be conducted without reference to the newspapers of the United States, is left as a mystery.

It is not known what course, if any course, the proposed investigation will now take. Efforts to locate Walter Rogers have been unavailing. One report was that he had said there would be an investigation of "international wire communication service," assisted by schools of journalism pupils.

Whatever the merits of the present dispute, there isn't going to be any Rockefeller-financed scientific news or newspaper "probe". Some other benevolent agency may finance it, but not John D. Rockefeller, or his son, or any of his foundations.

Ivy L. Lee's statement follows:

"The article by Dr. William T. Ellis in EDITOR & PUBLISHER for September 6 entitled 'Rockefeller Money Backs Scientific Probe of News Methods and Sources' gives an inaccurate impression. The inaccuracy of the impression is intensified by the heading, on the cover page of this number, entitled 'Rockefeller Fortune Backs Investigation of Newspapers.'

"The facts in the matter are given below. The meaning of those facts is definitely that 'Rockefeller money' is not backing a 'probe' of news methods and sources, and the 'Rockefeller fortune' is not backing 'an investigation of newspapers'.

"No plan could be more remote from the purposes of either Mr. John D. Rockefeller, Senior, or Junior, or any of the foundations established by Mr. Rockefeller.

"Nevertheless, the article by Dr. Ellis states that a 'comprehensive survey . . . of the entire news aspect of the American newspapers is now in the early stages of its operation.' It is added that two years will be consumed in the investigation, that a budget has been fixed at $170,000, and that aside from the preliminary expense fund of $2,500 the work has already had a grant of $25,000. The clear implication of the article is that all these funds have been supplied or pledged by Rockefeller agencies and that 'the balance of the budget will be forthcoming as the work proceeds'.

"The facts in this matter are as follows:

"For some time past the American Sociological Society has considered the problem as to whether or not a scientific inquiry could be made into the sources and methods of distribution of international news, the primary purpose being to seek to determine just how the United States gets its information concerning what is going on in foreign countries. The subject was urged and promoted by Mr. Walter S. Rogers, well known as a student of foreign affairs and as an expert in matters of international cable and other communications.

"Prof. Jerome Davis, then of Dartmouth and now of Yale University, brought the matter to the attention of the Laura Spelman Memorial (established by Mr. John D. Rockefeller) about a year ago. There were a number of conferences between officers of the Memorial and Prof. Davis, as well as with Prof. H. A. Miller of Oberlin College, (sic) who is also active in the Sociological Society.

"It was later decided by the American Sociological Society to refer the whole subject to the Social Science Research Council, which is representative of the American Economic Association, the American Political Science Association, the American Statistical Association, and the American Sociological Society.

"The Social Science Research Council, after considering the proposal in a general way, decided that the project was an important one, and that a conference or several conferences should be held. First, to determine the possible scope of such a project, and, secondly, whether it might be possible to organize such an inquiry on a scientific basis.

"Prof. Charles Merriam of Chicago University, chairman of the Social Science Research Council, thereupon joined Prof. Davis and Prof. Miller in a request to the Laura Spelman Memorial to finance these preliminary conferences.

"The council requested an appropriation from the Memorial of an amount not to exceed $2,500 for the expenses of such conferences. These expenses were to cover the travelling expenses of those who were to attend the conferences, as well as the clerical expenses incidental to the conferences. The subject of the conferences, in the words of the Social Science Research Council to the Laura Spelman Memorial, was to canvass the possibility of a 'thorough and objective investigation of the instrumentalities involved in the world-wide gathering and dissemination of current news and opinion of international concern, and of the underlying related problems of the formation, expression, and significance of attitudes on international affairs.'

"On March 6 the Memorial voted the $2,500 requested, but it was expressly indicated to the Social Science Research Council that the appropriation did not involve any commitment to finance any aspect of the proposed investigation.

"The first conference was held at Washington on May 2d. Those present were:

"Dr. Edward F. Gay, Director with Professor Mitchell of the Bureau of Economic Research, Prof. H. A. Miller of Oberlin College; Prof. Jerome Davis of Dartmouth; Prof. Harold G. Moulton, of the Institute of Economics; Dr. Walter Williams, Dean of the School of Journalism, University of Missouri; Prof. Willard G. Bleyer, of the School of Journalism, University of Wisconsin; Dr. R. M. Yerkes, Washington; Mr. Bruce Bliven, of the New Republic; Dr. E. E. Slosson, of Washington and Mr. Walter S. Rogers, Chairman.

"The conference at Washington agreed that the subject matter was of great public interest and importance; it was agreed that the matter should be considered further by the different members of the conference with a view to bringing their later conclusions to a subsequent conference. The conference adjourned without other definite conclusion than that Mr. Walter Rogers should remain as chairman and that subsequent meetings should be held at his call.

"In the progress of the conference at Washington on May 2nd, there was some discussion of what it would cost to conduct a fruitful inquiry along the lines indicated, and some of those present, indicated their opinion that much could be accomplished in an inquiry reaching over a couple of years and involving an expenditure of around $175,000. That, however, was entirely an informal guess by certain individuals present and was not

UTILITIES DISCOVER POWER OF ADVERTISING

1924 Budget Will Reach $11,000,000, an Increase of $3,000,000 Over 1923, But Industries Still Under-Advertised—Many Successful Campaigns

EDITOR & PUBLISHER herewith presents the first of a series of nine articles dealing with public utilities and advertising prepared, in response to many requests, by the Bureau of Advertising of the American Newspaper Publishers Association. The purpose is to help public utility companies build business through newspaper advertising. The articles are built upon facts rather than theories.

IT is estimated that in the United States alone $17,400,000,000 is invested in public utility industries.

In 1923 these enterprises spent about $8,000,000 for advertising. It is said that $11,000,000 will be spent for the same purpose in 1924.

Public utility advertising has been shown to be profitable—to return definite results in sales and confidence based upon public understanding.

The industries in question have been slow to grasp the fact that they were "under advertised"—as the figures covering advertising appropriations quoted above will indicate.

But the gradual increase in sums spent for the "salesman in print" shows a definite realization of undeveloped opportunities and a recognition of advertising as the implement of cultivation.

Barron's National Financial Weekly of July 29, 1924, notices a distinct improvement in the public utilities situation and makes this significant comment:

"There is another factor contributing to the prosperity of our public utility companies, the significance of which has been little stressed. This factor is improved public relations. How has this improvement been brought about? Not by slush funds or devious lobbying, but by public education largely through intelligent advertising.

"As public confidence grows, public utilities should congratulate themselves on their wisdom in devoting so much sensible effort to improve public relations."

The table below, which was compiled by the Public Utilities Advertising Association, shows in detail the advertising expenditures by groups of public utilities in 1923 and the estimated appropriations for 1924:

	1923	1924	Increase	Per cent of Increase
Light and power	$3,000,000	$4,500,000	$1,500,000	50
Elec. railways	2,000,000	2,500,000	500,000	25
Gas (manufactured)	1,500,000	1,780,000	250,000	16⅔
Gas (natural)	500,000	750,000	250,000	50
Telephone (est.)	1,000,000	1,500,000	500,000	50
Totals	$8,000,000	$11,000,000	$3,000,000	37½%

The gross sales of electricity for 1923 are given as $1,300,000,000. This does not include the sales of appliances. The estimated investment in the industry is $5,800,000,000. But the companies in this group spent only $3,000,000 in advertising to produce sales or to improve their position with their customers who number 13,357,000.

There were 370,000,000,000 cubic feet of gas sold in 1923 which returned about $425,000,000 in revenue. The sales of appliances by the gas companies themselves is reported at $45,000,000. The total investment in this industry, including the production of gas and the manufacture of appliances, is about $4,000,000,000. The gas companies put about $2,000,000 into advertising.

The telephone industry, with an investment of $2,000,000,000 and an annual business volume of about $725,000,000, spent only $1,000,000 in advertising last year. But the results from this advertising are reported as so satisfactory that a 50 per cent increase in appropriation is indicated by expenditures in 1924.

The electric railways with their estimated investment of $5,600,000,000 and reported receipts from operation of $951,000,000, used about $2,000,000 for advertising in 1923.

These huge investment figures and, what is more to the point, the estimates covering the volume of annual business, make the advertising expenditures look insignificant indeed.

Compared with the appropriations of from 1 per cent to 3 per cent of gross receipts which are normally set aside by successful merchants for advertising the term "under advertised" seems well applied to public utilities—particularly in view of what advertising has accomplished in this field.

In the chapters that follow, an effort has been made to give some suggestion of these accomplishments. It is not possible to tell of all successful public utility campaigns. From the many statements submitted by various companies, a few have been selected which show how advertising was employed to reach some definite business objective. The selection was made also with a view of indicating the varied uses to which newspaper advertising has been applied successfully.

The stories include examples of how advertising has stimulated the electric wiring of homes, how merchants have been induced through advertising to improve their window lighting, how the question of proper lighting in the home has been successfully dealt with.

Sales of appliances and the consequent increase in the consumption of current are plainly traceable to advertising.

Other statements show clearly how the public has been informed fully as to the aims, policies, service and problems of the companies, and how it has been interested in "customer ownership." One official reports $6,000 customers of his company becoming stockholders as the result of an advertising campaign.

Under the head of successful methods employed in advertising several companies have outlined their policies as to size and frequency of copy used in campaigns.

The amount of advertising costs in relation to sales is also touched upon in interesting fashion. Thus we are told of a short campaign that sold vacuum cleaners at an advertising tax of about $1.95 each.

For want of space, a number of experiences have been summarized in a single chapter. Virtually all of these might have been woven into lengthy and highly interesting stories. The keynote of them all, however, seems to be that each company has a very definite belief in the power of newspaper advertising to accomplish concrete results in the way of increased and better business.

STOCK SALE BAN LIFTED

Court Rules Pittsburgh Dispatch Company Can Sell Shares in State

A victory was won by the Pittsburgh Daily Dispatch Publishing Company which is fostering a project for a new daily paper in Pittsburgh when the Dauphin County Court at Harrisburg reversed the State Secretary of Banking who ruled that the company could not be registered under the State Securities Act. The Court ordered the Securities Bureau to record the company.

Judge Wickersham, who wrote the opinion, held that allegations of the stock being sold as that of a Ku Klux Klan newspaper had no important bearing on the case. It had previously declared its intention of starting publication during August, but the paper has not yet appeared.

Present plans, according to George P. Grise, president of the company, are to begin publication in November. Foundations for presses are being laid and Grise says machinery installation will be rushed. The Dauphin Court's decision making possible the resumption of the sale of stock boosts the prospects of the company, Grise says.

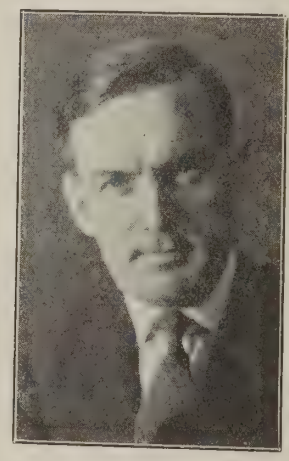
DAILY BROADCASTS FIRPO FIGHT

La Nacion Subscribers Hear Round by Round in Buenos Aires

An unusual example of newspaper enterprise was displayed by the Buenos Aires La Nacion the night of the Wills-Firpo prizefight, when that newspaper radioed a round by round account of the fight through 6,000 miles of ether to Buenos Aires.

The account was broadcast from Station KDKA, Pittsburgh, and despite bad weather conditions was heard virtually in its entirety by the crowd gathered in front of the La Nacion office, W. W. Davies, New York representative declared.

A long distance telephone wire connected the ringside at Boyles' Thirty Acres with the broadcasting station in Pittsburgh. Florent Gibson from the sporting department of the Pittsburgh Post was the announcer. In Buenos Aires the round by round was transmitted in English through a loud speaker. At the same time a special announcer translated the account into Spanish.



Mr. Davies, who engineered the feat, received congratulations from many newspaper men, including Frank A. Munsey, Frederick Roy Martin, Karl Bickel and Herbert Bayard Swope.

Two Umpires Sue Newspaper

Charging that the Oklahoman Publishing Company publishers of the Oklahoma City Times and Daily Oklahoman, had damaged their reputation by printing "false and defamatory" articles, attorneys for Umpires Jerrald W. Hayes and Edward P. Gaffney, of the Western League, have instituted suit for $5,000. The suit is believed to be the first of its kind on record. Following a game of July 27, during which a near riot occurred, the newspapers are alleged to have carried stories referring to the umpires as "Harry Starr" Hayes and "Jesse James" Gaffney.

First in the United States

THE NEW YORK TIMES prints more national advertising than any other newspaper in the United States.

The Times published in 1923 a total of 5,624,358 agate lines of national advertising, 721,925 lines more than the second newspaper in the United States and 1,511,004 lines more than the third newspaper.

In eight months of 1924, The New York Times published 3,748,844 lines of national advertising, 956,724 lines more than the next New York newspaper.

The New York Times is first in national advertising because of its unrivalled advantages in the greatest market in the world.

More than 800 national advertisers employed the columns of The Times in 1923. Of this number 200 used The Times exclusively among New York morning newspapers.

The circulation of The New York Times, 378,174 average daily and Sunday, represents a buying power not equalled by any other newspaper.

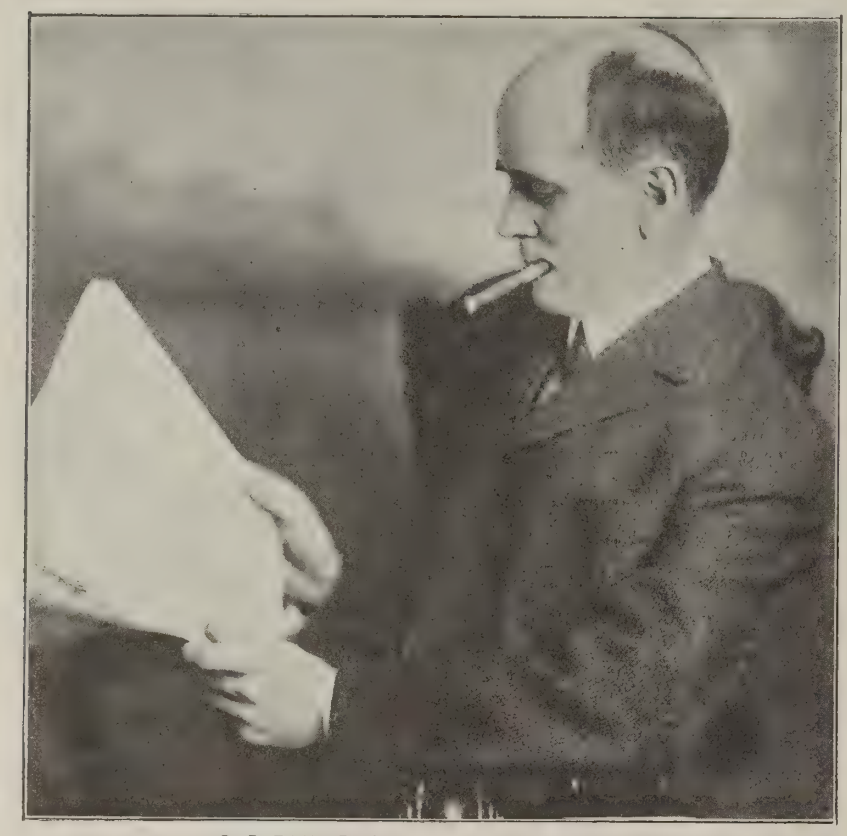
Volume, quality, and responsiveness combine to put this circulation of The New York Times on the highest level of advertising value.

The Sunday edition of The New York Times (in which 2,577,540 lines of national advertising were published in 1923) has a total circulation in excess of 575,000 copies, of which 400,000 are in the area within 150 miles of New York. In the quality and the buying power of this concentrated circulation, and of subscribers in 8,000 cities and towns in the United States, The New York Times is without equal in the newspaper field.

National advertisers find special opportunities in the Rotogravure Magazine Section which is a part of the Sunday edition of The New York Times (having the lowest rotogravure advertising rate per thousand in the United States).

The New York Times submits all advertisements offered for publication to its censorship and declines all false or misleading announcements.

The New York Times



The New York Times is undoubtedly our greatest newspaper. From the news point of view every copy of The Times is a masterpiece of craftsmanship. And it is gratifying to record that it is as much the creation of the profession of journalism as may be found in New York today..... No newspaper in the country is freer from outside control, none more wholly divorced from other business enterprises, none with publishing standards of greater integrity.

From "Can Journalism Be a Profession?" by Ernest Gruening, in the Century Magazine for September, 1924.

The news in a newspaper is its reason for existence. All sorts of "features" are added to attract and hold the interest of this group and that....but if the news were omitted it wouldn't be a newspaper. The only genuine newspaper in all the large cities of America is The New York Times.

From "The Continent" August 28, 1924.

NEWSPAPER MAKERS AT WORK

G. J. PALMER—Confessor to Texas Journalism.

THE editor who considers advertising a by-product or a necessary evil, or the business executive who considers editorial policy and news features simply a means of getting advertising, does not qualify as a real newspaper man, in the opinion of G. J. Palmer, recently engaged as assistant general manager of the Houston (Tex.) Chronicle. The real newspaper man, Mr. Palmer holds seeks a middle ground perspective through which he recognizes the legitimacy and importance of advertising as a business and at the same time appreciates the value and dignity of newspaper editing as a profession.

After 5 years during which he viewed newspaper operations "from the outside looking in," Mr. Palmer returns to the work in a position to get just the perspective he considers necessary for properly evaluating both the advertising and the news functions of a newspaper.

Mr. Palmer became business manager of the Houston Post at the age of 23 years, and retired at the age of 48. His long and close study of economic conditions connected with the business, his policy of co-operation between news and advertising departments, and his successful negotiations in matters arising between publishers and employes, fitted him for making acutely analytical observations during the time he was free from daily routine and could study situations as an observer instead of a participant.

During the 5 years in which he was not actively engaged in newspaper work, Mr. Palmer kept in touch with developments in the newspaper field as special commissioner of the Texas Newspaper Publishers Association. He was also a dollar-a-year man as head of the newspaper division of the War Industries Board, so that his point of view is national in scope, without losing sight of the problems peculiar to each publisher. He returns to participation in the solving of these problems with a clearer ideal of service to the public, an ideal that became more sharply defined while he was unincumbered with the details of the active worker.

Mr. Palmer would be considered a conservative who has kept fully abreast of the modern trend. He knows what is going on in the newspaper world, and he evaluates departures and experiments for what they are worth, but he shows little inclination to follow fads. He is strong on worth-while service to the public as the policy that makes possible great newspapers.

His code of fair dealing, without favor to either employer or employe, has done much to stabilize working conditions in the mechanical departments of Texas newspapers, whose publishers frequently call upon him to assist in adjusting differences or in discussion of matters of policy. He is equally in demand as a counselor to employes.

"The old theory that the business and editorial departments of a newspaper must be practically divorced is my one pet aversion," Mr. Palmer says. "In my opinion, no newspaper can be completely successful unless all departments are in accord on the one basic principle of honest, active, worth-while service to the public.

"Unless the business department conducts its activities so as to give the reader through its advertising columns the news of the business world, it has failed to do its part. Good advertising is news to the buying public and advertising that does not carry a news value is poor advertising.

"In order, therefore, for the newspaper to give a maximum of service to the public, it is necessary for the editor to look upon advertising as the news of the business world, and not as a necessary evil. It is equally important that the business executive understand the importance of strong editorial policy and the value of the news columns as a medium for disseminating information about the world at large. He should look upon news features as an end in themselves, and not merely as a means of getting advertising."

German Editor Honored

Louis G. Lamade, editor and owner of the Altoona (Pa.) Volksfuehrer, was honor guest recently at a dinner tendered by his office staff and personal friends in honor of his 70th birthday anniversary. During the dinner he was presented with a gold watch and chain. Mr. Lamade was born in Baden, Germany, and came to the United States when 13 years of age. In 1881 he assumed control of the Volksfuehrer.

Chicago Agency Issues Booklet

"Four Square Advertising" is the title of a booklet just issued by the Mitchell-Faust Advertising Company, Chicago.

DETROIT NEWS PLANS 9-COLUMN PAGE

Press Equipment Ready Against Demands for Advertising Space Requiring Too Many Pages of 8-Column Paper

The Detroit News is equipping its plant to print a 9-column page, in anticipation of further demands by advertisers for space. No date has been set for the change, as the new multi-unit press plant of the News is adequate for present requirements.

The proposed nine column page columns are two inches wide as are the present columns. Paper rolls will be 78, 58½ and 39 inches wide. Present widths are 70, 52½ and 35 inches.

"We have been concerned for some years during the rapid growth in advertising demands, as to how many pages could be satisfactorily distributed by an afternoon paper in a city of a million people," H. S. Scott, general manager of the News, stated to EDITOR & PUBLISHER this week. "The interests of the carrier, reader and advertiser are all involved, as anything that would disrupt a 100 per cent delivery system would immediately prove dangerous in its far-reaching effect on the advertiser, and it was to forestall this possibility that the News, in purchasing additional presses, decided on the 9-column page, and at the same time to replace all its older presses with equipment of similar capacity. This will soon be accomplished, as the last of the new press units are now being delivered.

"In this manner a maximum 48 (9-column) page paper, carrying the same amount of editorial matter, would accommodate 48 columns of additional advertising without increasing its bulk.

"Changes in composing room and stereotype equipment do not present any serious problems, and all can be taken care of within a reasonable time, which would be required for consumption of paper in storage, and the accumulation of tonnages of the new sizes which would be required for the 9-column page.

"Just what the next year holds in store for the newspapers of the country in the way of advertising, I suppose will depend largely on business conditions, but it is certainly comforting for us to feel that we are equipped to meet any emergency that might arise in the way of further advertising developments."

Reporter Killed Covering Assignment

While covering an assignment for the Boston American, George M. Parker, son of General and Mrs. James M. Parker, of Newport, R. I., was killed by a fall at Commonwealth Pier, Boston, Sept. 15. He was a graduate of Middlesex School and Harvard University. During the World War, as first lieutenant in the Fourth Field Artillery, U. S. A., and later as aide-de-camp to Gen. H. P. McCain at Camp Devens, Mass.

Oklahoma City News Cuts Price

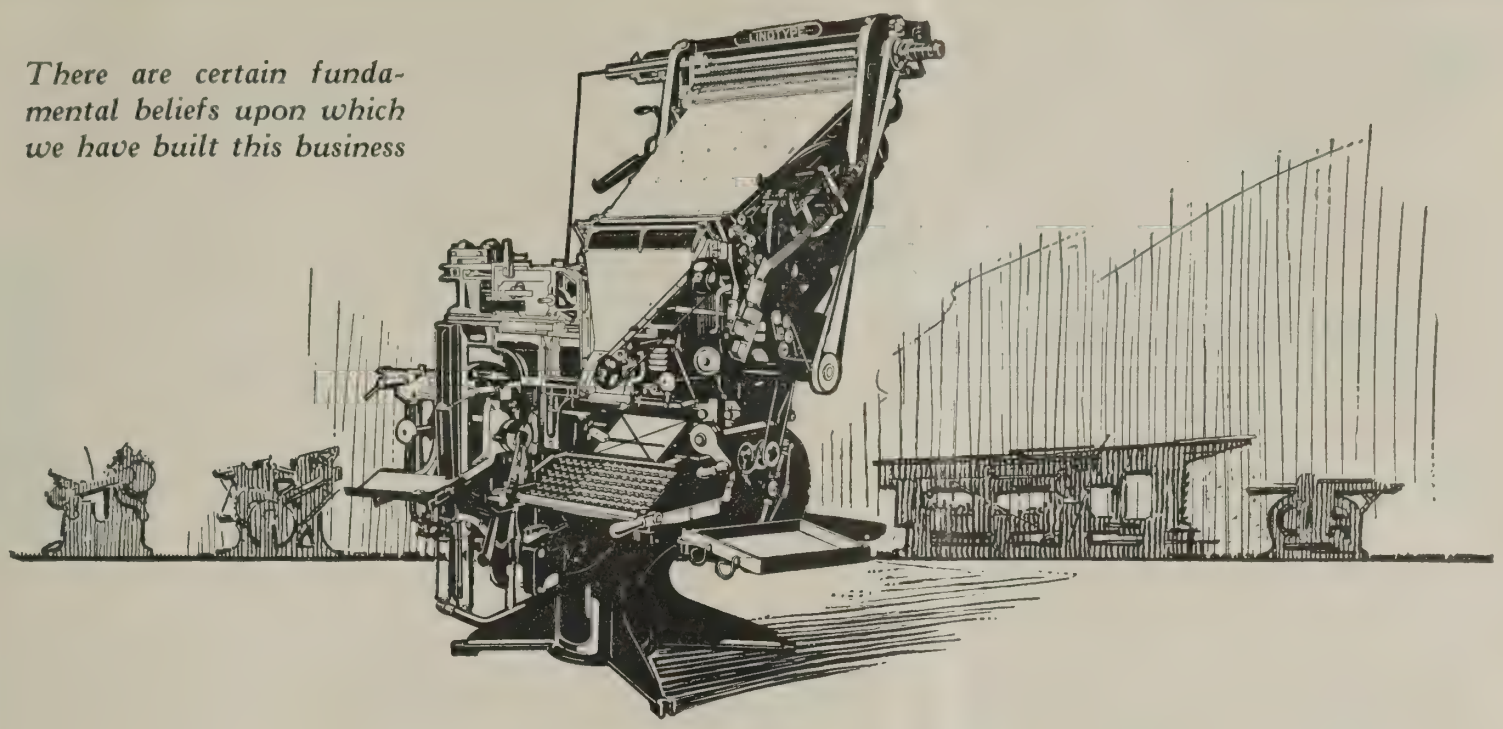
The Oklahoma City (Okla.) News of the Scripps-Howard chain has completed its return to pre-war circulation rates by reducing its carrier price to 6 cents per week. Some weeks ago it cut the street sale price from 2 cents to 1.

No Stunts, No Schemes, But Just Honest Advertising, Honestly Merchandised

More and more, in days of cautious buying, vendors of advertising space adopt the same selling methods as those who have commodity merchandise to sell. There are as many schemes for building circulations as there are for selling kitchen cabinets, as many free deals disguised as "write-ups" and "readers" for filling the advertising columns as there are free deals and special discounts in the grocery or drug trade.

But the newspaper that has the complete confidence of its readers and of its advertisers holds to established policies with scrupulous regard for the quality of its circulation and the value of its advertising space. As with any other standard brand of merchandise the display advertising lineage of a really great newspaper is highest in proportion to the total volume of business when the curve of general business is at its lowest point.

The Cincinnati Times-Star during the depression of 1924 has increased its circulation and broken all past records for display advertising lineage. Absolutely as well as relatively it has forged ahead in its field without resorting to a single stunt or scheme. Sustained quality, complete coverage of its market, reader confidence backed by intelligent merchandising service, these are the only reasons for Times-Star leadership, a leadership that has been unchallenged for more than sixteen years.



Times-Star display advertising lineage has increased because it has increased the profitable business of its advertisers.

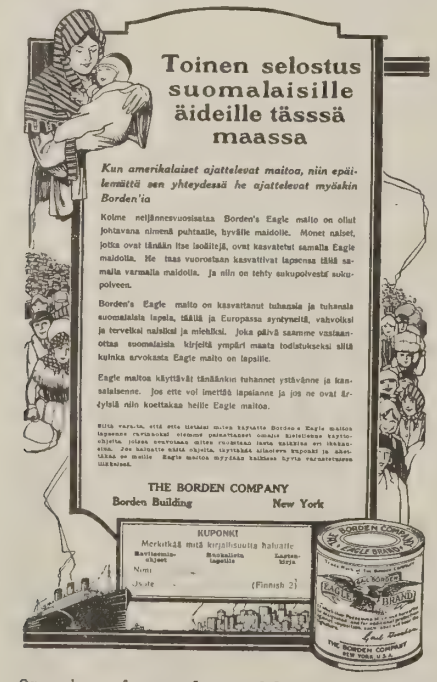
BORDEN'S MILK FOUND RICH MARKET THROUGH FOREIGN LANGUAGE PRESS

Company Now Using 200 Newspapers Printed in More Than 20 Tongues—Average Dealer Neglecting This Field, Says G. I. Kram

By HAMMOND EDWARD FRANKLIN

UNTIL about a year ago, Borden's Evaporated Milk was not sold or merchandised to any great extent in Oklahoma. In fact, very little was sold there.

But in a small section of eastern Oklahoma, a few dealers ordered it regularly and one or two jobbers kept handling it. Sales officials of the Borden Company were puzzled as to why this little area in a market largely undeveloped should be so partial to this milk.



Then it was found that this section had a large Italian population. Although there was no local Italian newspaper, these Italians were receiving the New York Italian newspapers, where they read of Borden's Milk week after week, the only evaporated milk advertising they read. They called for the brand and the dealers supplied it.

This is one sidelight upon the great undeveloped "foreign language market at home," which may be reached through foreign-language newspapers and the importance of which manufacturers are only beginning to appreciate.

Sales of a cigaret jumped in Detroit among the Armenian population. An investigation showed this group was an off-shot of a big Armenian colony in Boston, the paper of which is read by almost all of the Detroit Armenians. The cigaret had been advertised in the Boston Armenian newspaper.

The steamship lines have been among the leaders in developing this immense market through newspaper advertising in native tongues. Next come houses like Colgate & Co. and the Borden Company, which, through many years of keeping at it, have built a commanding leadership in this field.

How the Borden Company extended its condensed milk business points the way to how other advertisers can create a large volume of sales which up to now may have gone unrecognized as possible.

Twenty years ago, through its agency and Louis Kram, Inc., New York, the Borden Company bought for about $500 a modest campaign in a small list of New York foreign language newspapers. The first Borden advertisement in plain type appeared in the New York Jewish Morning Journal. The results warranted continuing the effort. Year by year the company has increased its appropriation until now it regards foreign language newspapers as an all-important publicity factor, along with magazines, car cards, newspapers printed in English, and so on.

Today the company uses some 200 high-class foreign-language newspapers in more than 20 tongues. It uses them steadily. The copy is prepared as carefully as that in English, with keen regard for the niceties of various races

Care is taken to keep human figures in character in foreign language advertising. Above is an example of Borden copy in a Polish paper. The crowd shown in the lower portion is not an American crowd.

(which affect some kinds of illustrations which must be used). Nearly every piece of copy contains a coupon which may be sent to the Borden Company at New York. This brings recipe booklets, feeding charts and directions and in fact there is a complete set of literature in the various languages.

Care is taken to keep human figures shown "in character." For instance, in an advertisement headed "To Polish Mothers in America," the figure of the mother with a baby, although attractive, is decidedly that of a woman of the type who will read the message. The crowd of folks arriving is not an American crowd; it consists of foreign-speaking folk. By attention to these matters, the company is able to adapt a piece of copy to many foreign-speaking groups with little change in form other than translating the words in the correct idiom. The copy is prepared by the H. K. McCann Company, advertising agency, New York, with the co-operation of Louis Kram, Inc., New York, foreign-language representatives, who have been associated in the foreign-language Borden work from its inception.

The time came when the Borden Company wanted to spread out on evaporated milk. Chicago was a weak spot on it. About a year ago the company added lists of papers in the purely foreign sections, the only additional publicity work done beside some car cards and a few outdoor boards in English.

Borden's regular salesmen were properly trained in foreign language selling, supplied with sets of proofs of the foreign language advertising, special data furnished by the foreign language publishers and list of prospective retail accounts in the various language groups, and "went to it." Talking the language did not prove an absolute essential, but being able to lay down a set of proofs and a letter from the publisher in the native tongue helped the salesmen get results. More Borden's evaporated milk has been sold for the first six months of this year in Chicago than all last year.

The Borden Company, through its consistent policy, now is reckoned to enjoy 90 per cent of the condensed milk business in the foreign language market in America.

"When it is born in mind that some 20 per cent of the population of the United States consists of foreign-speaking families of the first or second generation and that in many large eastern cities the percentage runs far above that, it is evident that in this field is a market worth cultivating," pointed out G. I. Kram, vice-president of Louis Kram, Inc.

"It is hard to understand when one delves into the immense foreign-speaking sections of the United States why it is that so many fertile fields for the building of brand demand are left uncultivated, unless it is that the average publisher of a foreign language newspaper in the United States is a poor salesman, unable to get his message to the advertising and sales managers. For one reason or another, the average advertising agent and manager fails to realize the size of these markets and neglects to cultivate their buying power. On the other hand, the past few years have found a number of manufacturers keenly alive to market development, going into these sections and developing real volume to a surprising degree.

"Today in the Polish section of Buffalo, the Hungarian sections in the coal mining districts of Pennsylvania, in the Bohemian factory neighborhoods, etc., Eagle Brand Condensed Milk is one of the best known food products sold in stores. The newly arrived immigrant learns to know Borden brands as among the first English words he hears. It is this opportunity to pre-empt a market that one great value of foreign language newspaper advertising lies. When the immigrant is getting his first impression of America he is most open to brand advertising. Everything being new, the first impressions have the best chance of proving lasting impressions.

"As the immigrant family becomes Americanized, it gradually turns to a broader assortment of publications, but the immigrant, no matter how long in America, seldom overcomes the preference for newspapers in his own language. Advertising in this language has a sentimental as well as a practical appeal to him. His family, born in America, is nevertheless raised to a large extent with the products the parents select. Gradually during the last few years, the best publications in the various languages have come to the front and in many instances have established themselves along with the best printed dailies in English in their respective cities. Rates have become stabilized, circulation has been made more definite and reliable, and the papers have learned how to render a high-class merchandising service."

What about copy for this market? Naturally, it has to harmonize with the various foreign nationals' ideas on merchandise.

Recently in Boston Borden has been runing a car card showing roast beef with a heap of mashed potatoes made creamy with Borden's Milk. If this same advertisement were inserted in a Jewish newspaper, it would start a pogrom on the Borden organization. Nothing more insulting to a Jew than suggesting he combine a meat and milk dish at one meal could be conceived.

A leading cooking oil house had a recipe for southern fried chicken with cream gravy. This appeared in the Jewish papers with a rabbi's signature under it. The advertiser "got in bad" and the poor rabbi was nearly lynched.

The word mayonnaise is excellent French. The present would be as unfavorable a time to advertise mayonnaise in German papers as it would be to advertise sauerkraut in the Courier des Etats Unis of New York.

Attempting to advertise Nujol in Italian newspapers would be money thrown away, since the Italians eat a large amount of oil as a regular part of their diets.

An interesting sidelight on advertising in this group of the press is that readers respond to coupons, providing something worthwhile is offered. The reader will respond to coupons much as American readers did ten years ago.

It is as a rule too much to expect an advertiser to print dealer helps in all the many languages, but by adding to the usual helps some inexpensive trims, flimsies, stickers, etc., in the native tongue—in some cases furnished by the newspaper—the advertiser can materially increase the value of his window displays in foreign-language sections.

EDITOR & PUBLISHER believes that the value of the newspaper for developing sales in the huge foreign-speaking market is only now beginning to be realized and that in the years coming a large number of manufacturers, facing more intensive competition year by year, will turn to this field with liberal appropriations.

DENISON'S FLASH GAVE N. Y. WORLD BEAT ON CAVERLY DECISION

Took Tip as Judge Read and Signaled It to Western Union Man—Gained Four Minutes on A. P.—Presses Waited With Prepared Plates

"IN choosing imprisonment instead of death, the court is moved ....."

Thus Judge Caverly tipped off the newsmen on what the Leopold-Loeb verdict would be several long paragraphs before the end of his decision in Chicago. But only one newspaper man took the tip. He was Lindsay Denison, reporter for the New York Evening World.

LINDSAY DENISON

That newspaper was the first on New York streets with the news. Denison beat the A. P. flash by 4 minutes.

"Tuesday afternoon John H. Tennant sent me a message saying that he was informed Judge Caverly was going to give out his opinion in advance of pronouncing sentence, and for me to arrange to get it to the office to be released for an extra," Denison explained.

"Judge Caverly said he would read his opinion including the actual sentence before giving it out; but if we were getting out an extra on the verdict in New York, there was only the more need for being prompt in sending the flash.

"Mr. Forbes, commercial manager of the Western Union in Chicago, assigned to me Monday afternoon one of the 14 wires which had been strung to the court house. A few of the instruments—including those of the Associated Press, the United Press, the International News and the Chicago News and others were in the court room itself at the elbows of reporters. My wire was in a room across the corridor. The operator was on the job at 8 o'clock sending my advance scene story directly into the Evening World office. When I stopped writing advanced scenery, he held the wire open.

"The Chicago newspaper men were good enough to reserve for me the seat which had been occupied during the hearings by Dudley Nichols of the Curtis newspapers, who had reported back to the New York Evening Post. It was cut off from the door after the room was filled.

"With Mr. Forbes I wrote out 4 possible verdicts:

"1. Life imprisonment for both.
"2. Death for both.
"3. Death for Leopold; life for Loeb.
"4. Death for Loeb; life for Leopold.

"The last two look silly; nothing was silly in the atmosphere of rumors 'right from the judge himself' that were loose in that building. I really should have put in more alternatives, including the possibility of a minimum 14-year sentence to cover the Illinois murder law.

"Forbes had a carbon copy of my list, which I kept on the desk in front of me, as a 'safety first' check against getting rattled and having signal aphasia. We agreed that he would send the flash according to the number of fingers I held up; after repeating the finger signal back to me.

"But as the room crowded up Forbes got doubtful. He worked his way to me and suggested that if there were confusion and he could not see me, he get permission to repeat to the Evening World the flash of the Chicago News, which had an instrument right at the door—returning after sending it to get my verification. That suited me and the News man.

"The first part of Judge Caverly's opinion pointed to a death sentence. John Fay, the veteran who runs the World Bureau in Chicago, leaned over to whisper to me that I might as well write out a death sentence flash. I told him I had already written it. He almost had a fit. He thought I mean I had sent it.

"Just then Judge Caverly reached the sentence: 'In choosing imprisonment instead of death the court is moved——'

"I held up one finger. Forbes saw it and looked down doubtfully at the News instrument. I kept up the one finger. He held up one finger, nodded and made a ring around the figure '1' on my slip and pushed it through the crack of the door, left a bit ajar by policemen outside who were listening in. A messenger took it across the hall and it was in the Evening World office.

"The A. P. man, of course, could not flash until the actual legal sentence was pronounced, two and a half minutes later.

"Getting the jump on the full text of the judge's opinion was another matter. All of the judge's 20 copies were gone when I got to the bench. I saw one of them safely in the hands of the A. P. man and assumed the text was on its way. Mr. Forbes came to me as I was writing my lead and asked 'What about the text?'

"'The A. P. is sending it,' I said. 'Why pay tolls for what they've already started?'

"Forbes looked a little queer. I ran back into the court room and asked the A. P. man if he had sent the text. He said he would send it when he had finished sending the bulletins.

"Back in the telegraph room a number of Chicago reporters were sending the text by telephone and telegraph. We got hold of a half-page already sent and kept on adding other half-pages. The World office had the text all in type when the first A. P. copy arrived.

"Like every other reporter, I am giving to kicking on telegraph service. But I find my kicks always start in the uninformed stupidity of counter clerks in offices where dispatches are received for tube or carrier transmission to an operating room. I've almost never had trouble with an operating man—and of all of them Forbes was the livest wire of them all."

Just as Denison had prepared separate sentences to be sent from Chicago, the Evening World staff strategy board, John H. Tennant, managing editor, Arthur Krock, advisory editor, Miles D. Stettenbenz, news editor and John M. Ramey, city editor, had prepared separate first page plates—one "life," one "death" and one "14 years imprisonment." The first two were put on presses; followed by Dennison's "scenery" story up to 15 minutes of the moment of sentence. When the operator called the flash from the telegraph receiver, an open telephone carried the word to the press room and the presses carrying the "life imprisonment" plates started.

Denison has been with the Evening World since 1908. Graduated from Yale with the Class of 1895, he first was assistant to the editor of Cosmopolitan Magazine. At Yale he had been chairman of the Yale Literary Monthly and had tried for all the writing prizes and won a few of them.

After a year with Cosmopolitan, Denison resigned to join the staff of the New York Sun, remaining with that newspaper until 1906, when he became assistant editor of Everybody's Magazine, the position he was holding when he went to the Evening World.

Baltimore American Cuts Price

Announcement was made Wednesday that the Baltimore American, morning, would sell in future for 2 cents instead of 3 and that the Sunday American would sell for 5 cents instead of 10. This is a return to the price for which the papers sold under the management and ownership of Frank A. Munsey, before their purchase late in March, 1923, by William Randolph Hearst.

Permanent roads are a good investment —not an expense

How the Motor Industry Set the Pace for Highway Building

The "horseless carriage" of yesterday is now being produced as the modern automobile at the rate of 4,000,000 a year. The total number of motor vehicles registered in the United States is over 16,000,000.

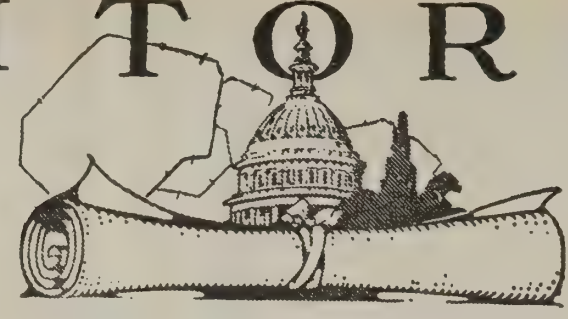
And automobiles built today are more than ever capable of economically serving both business and recreation needs.

But there is an obstacle standing in the way of their maximum service to owners.

For while the automobile industry made paved highways an economic necessity, the mileage of such roads is today years behind the requirements of modern traffic.

Happily motorists everywhere are boosting for more and wider paved highways.

And extensive experience has taught them that Concrete Highways are one of the best all-around investments they can make—an investment that pays big dividends.



As one of our 16,000,000 motorists you know better than anyone else the need for more and wider Concrete Roads. Start now to help your local officials provide them.

PRESS BLINDERS

FIRST we have newspaper men actually advocating blinders for themselves, rules for the limitation of their great function as public observers, restriction of court reporting in deference to a supposedly sacred institution. We hear a few newspaper men soberly discussing the "evil" portent of "trial by newspaper" and such nonsense.

What happens? Why, as night follows day, the legal profession takes up the matter. Naturally the legal profession is for blinders for the press, if not a dog muzzle with a gag in it.

Chief Justice Martin, of the civil courts of Montreal, is outspoken. He would have laws to prevent newspapers from publishing any news concerning a case before trial. The chief justice would not prevent newspapers from publishing news of the trial itself. The logic of his view leads on to complete suppression of news concerning the courts.

In other columns of EDITOR & PUBLISHER this week observe how the courts of England handle newspaper men who take their public service seriously and attempt to force efficient police activity by thorough and enterprising reporting. Fines are imposed upon the newspaper proprietors. They are jerked up as sinister offenders.

Do you want this system imported into our country? Do you want to take the formal announcements of police and court officials and rest upon them for your news? Have you such blind faith in the legal structure? Is it so perfectly developed, free from fault, beyond the criticism of the people who created it and so infallible as to merit a holy and unapproachable status in the scheme of life?

We believe in orderly court proceedure. We want judges and juries to be free to find justice, unrestrained and unhindered. We do not palliate or excuse occasional instances of ignorant, impudent, or ill-advised court reporting and particularly do we condemn interference with the naturally secret operations of Grand Juries.

Nothing has happened which, by any stretch of the imagination, could warrant a sober discussion by newspaper men of laws or rules to limit the free flow of newspaper publicity concerning the everyday operations of the courts, and all of the courts, of the land. Lawyers and judges, from their highly developed sense of professional competency, may seek to discourage and limit press activity; it is an amazing anomaly for newspaper men to fall for it.

EDITOR & PUBLISHER repeats: The social danger is not that there be too much publicity concerning our legal system—the danger is that there be too little. Any man who has actively reported in the courts of the great cities of this country, dealing with lawyers and court attaches, knows that for one instance wherein justice has been menaced from the outside, there have been a thousand instances where it has been menaced from the inside.

Good reporters, stand your ground! Don't let lawyers or faint-hearted newspapermen talk you out of it! The stakes are higher than mock dignity.

Mr. Advertising Manager: How many active local advertising accounts have your solicitors reported on in 30 days—how many inactive accounts have you queried?

WILDCATTING

SEVERAL newspapers across the country, to gain political advantage, recently published news stories concerning certain alleged significant additions made to one of the candidate's speeches after the original text had been given to the press.

Both the original text and the "ads" were marked with the usual confidential release lines. EDITOR & PUBLISHER is asked if it does not consider news stories based on the mechanics of confidential releases as breeches of faith. We certainly do think so and deplore them.

In the interest of a fast and responsible press newspaper men for two or three generations have been working with public men to induce the practise of advance copy under confidential release notices and have gained an almost universal success, in this country. It is a pity to abuse so beneficent a privilege.

PSALMS

Chapter XXXI—18-19

Let the lying lips be put to silence; which speak grievous things proudly and contemptuously against the righteous.

NEWSPAPER-MADE

THE sporting fraternity now call it a "newspaper frameup," that alleged boxing match between the "panther" and the "bull" (impudent libels on the animal kingdom) in Boyle's Thirty Acres. Sure enough, newspapers created it! The promoter needed only to put his feet into the pigeon holes of his desk and await the hour of his success. Some 60,000 gentlemen, lower instincts whetted by weeks of newspaper hammering, with words and pictures, stepped up to the box office and paid five or ten times the price of a theatre ticket for the privilege of seeing a sottish exhibition, not half so interesting or exciting to a normal mind as the act of a strong man laying a bridge I-beam.

The clergyman who so publicly sought to have one of the fighters deported for a violation of law now declares he was put up to that job by an anonymous newspaper man, and it is generally conceded in city slicker circles that the churchman was an easy "come-on" for a press agent in the back-ground. At any rate, it all went to pack the bleachers. All parties pulled harmoniously, no one thought of printing the true story of the plant, and the promoter counted $800,000 receipts. For this staggering sum the "sports" got a chance to "boo" at a couple of third-rate scrappers.

Conceding that an element of society is interested in prize fighting and that newspapers should cover such events, is there any defense for those newspapers, particularly in New York, that lent themselves unreservedly to the promotion and then, when the fight disgusted even the confirmed ringside fanatics, published great gobs of extreme exaggeration, certainly repugnant to the ordinary citizen.

The amount of space given to the panther-bull "frame-up" exceeded all bounds of propriety and the enthusiasm with which it was published lent color to the common criticism that newspapers neglect many sober subjects in zeal to feature quick circulation-getting (but not necessarily circulation-holding) sensations appealing to the lowest tastes.

NOTABLE MOVIE REFORM

EIGHT months ago EDITOR & PUBLISHER brought to the attention of Will Hays, dictator of motion-picture policy, facts revealed by Detroit News concerning indecencies and misrepresentations in advertising and publicity copy handed to newspapers. H. S. Scott, general manager of Detroit News, we had learned, had sent written notice to all local picture houses that objectionable matter must be cut from advertising copy intended for that paper. He said in this notice:

"The News will gladly forego the loss of the advertising of Detroit's motion-picture houses rather than publish pictures of women in a state of undress, suggestive poses, cut-lines intended to direct the mind to sex suggestion, or convey an idea of 'rottenness' that we find is never borne out on the screen itself."

Mr. Hays was asked what would be done to safeguard the newspaper press of the country. He did not reply in the concrete at the time, but indicated that the matter would be considered.

EDITOR & PUBLISHER is this week in receipt of a communication from Mr. Hays referring to our editorial stand and happily calling to our notice a set of resolutions which have just been passed by the Association of Motion Picture Producers, Inc., of California. Twenty-one of the great film-producing concerns are members of this organization.

The resolutions fit the situation admirably. They declare that, as a policy, the members of the association "exercise every possible care" to prevent the picturization of the "prevalent type of book and play," that they avoid using titles which are "indicative of a kind of picture which could not be produced, or by their suggestiveness seek to obtain attendance by deception, a thing equally reprehensible; and to prevent misleading, salacious or dishonest advertising."

These clear-cut resolutions were immediately ratified by the Western Association of Motion Picture Advertisers at a special meeting held in Los Angeles, the association including among its members all of the advertising and publicity men of the great studios located in and around Hollywood.

We hope for speedy performance equaling promise, and the earnest newspaper men of this country gratefully will acknowledge this act as an ethical accomplishment of high public value.

"Newspaper publishing is a business, not an up-lift," glibly remarks one cynic on the inside, but if press history teaches anything it is that newspaper publishing gets to be almighty bad business when the spark of public service has flickered out and the public realizes that fact.

WARNING GIRLS

TELL young girls, fresh from schools of journalism, not to come to New York for jobs, unless they have friends here or have plenty of money to support a prolonged situation-seeking campaign!

The other day a young woman from the middle west, who had seen only a few weeks of service on a small town daily, following graduation from a journalism school, called at EDITOR & PUBLISHER office. Her small capital had dwindled to the vanishing point and her pursuit of a job had been met on every hand by surly rejections of office boy protectors of the "gate." She had just managed to get an interview with a Sunday editor who had, in genuine kindness, told her that she was not far enough advanced to write for his publication. She told us about it, and wept, as every school-girl has a right to weep in such circumstances. Do not think her a coward—she had been fighting the impossible job battle for weeks and was earning her meals in a restaurant.

Not long ago the city editors of New York estimated that more men and women were seeking jobs on Park Row than there were jobs existing in this city. A boy may sleep in the park, or even ask for a "hand-out," but New York is not the place for a young and unfortified girl to stand the gaff of breaking into newspaper work. Tell them, however talented they may be, to expect a hard battle when they come here!

For 25 years he was associated with the News, for 15 years being its directing head. On March 1, 1923, he announced his retirement stating 25 years was quite long enough in newspaper work. Rotogravure Screen Greatly Enlarged

Showing more clearly than words the reason for the beautiful soft effects in rotogravure. The rotogravure 150-line screen is almost invisible in the finished result because the action of acid in the etching process is so controlled as to permit the lines to be partly etched away so that the ink from one cell all but touches the ink in adjacent cells.

Half-Tone Screen Greatly Enlarged

This enlargement is from a coated paper proof of a newspaper screen half-tone—the actual copy size shown at right.

The camera, in enlarging the small copy, has opened up the screen, making plain that the effects in half-tone printing depend upon clearly defined dots and spaces.

Note that in this half-tone enlargement the tone values are lost, while in the rotogravure example shown above the shading is retained.

Above examples taken from our recently published book, Rotogravure—How and When to Use It." Advertisers and advertising agencies will find many additional things of interest in this book, which is sent free on request.—Address Kimberly-Clark Company, Neenah, Wis

"STICK TO YOUR HOME TOWN" IS GIRL REPORTER'S ADVICE TO HER SEX

Genevieve Calkins Spent Hungry Days on Park Row Before She Became "Jean Vernon" of the N. Y. Daily News Staff. Now Enjoys Her Work

By GRANT L. DAVIS

"YOUNG women, go back to your home town, marry some nice young man and settle down!"

I had asked Jean Vernon, of the New York Daily News, just what advice she would give ambitious newspaper women anxious to take a fling at metropolitan journalism. The answer, quoted above, was a surprise.

Jean Vernon, whose real name by the way is Genevieve Calkins, recently caused a sizable ripple in New York's journalistic pond. Although she is only about 25 years old, and has done regular newspaper work in New York only since last December, she is already the only woman reporter who has spent a cold, spray-dashed night on a revenue cutter hunting rum runners off the Long Island coast. She has also hunted sharks with coast guard men.

When I talked with her in the News editorial room, she had just returned from a short vacation spent airplaning between New York and Dixville Knotch, N. H.

Jean wouldn't be content with an ordinary vacation. She exists on thrill.

Yet she is pleasantly feminine. Dressed simply in fall navy blue serge, with light blue linen waist, and hat with feather at a rakish angle, she does not attempt the mannish pose. And she is not in the least conceited. She would discount many of her exploits, which have won her praise from editorial room superiors.

"I wouldn't go back to the home town myself for anything," she admitted. "I wouldn't take my own advice—not for worlds. I just adore my work.

"But I do think its the best thing for many girls. There's far too many hard knocks in newspaper work."

Airplane hops, chasing rum runners, and sharks, these are adventures of only the last few weeks for Miss Calkins, as Jean Vernon, newspaper woman. Behind her are 3 years of hard fighting.

Graduated from Syracuse University, Class of 1921, she "narrowly escaped school teaching" to accept a position on the Syracuse Herald, where she spent a long, and possibly dull, year.

Then she went to the Yonkers (N. Y.) Statesman, and more interesting work, because she was put in charge of her own column. It was with this newspaper, on the advice of Earl Deland, publisher, that she took the name Jean Vernon.

Her next jump was to the Worcester (Mass.) Telegram-Gazette, where she conducted a weekly shopping page.

"Now comes a terrible chapter in my life," Jean declared, becoming autobiographical.

Jean Vernon, of the New York Daily News, takes the wheel of the U. S. Revenue Cutter Shark, the only woman reporter ever assigned to cover a rum runner chase off Long Island.

"I gave up work in Worcester to go on the craziest hunt. I wanted to run my own newspaper. Well, with some others, we started a newspaper in a little New England town, I wouldn't tell you its name for worlds. Our opposition was owned by 2 old spinsters, who had 19 cats.

"To make it short, I was just a little business fool. We didn't make our own salaries. And I found myself absolutely broke."

This was the plight she was in when Jean Vernon decided to make New York her newspaper mecca. She had enough money to pay her way to the world's largest city and that, with her ability to write was all. No assistance was forthcoming from her home. Of course she speedily came to know New York newspaper office boys well.

"I hate bread, but I made a point of eating all I could with the soup, which was all I could afford to order at restaurants," she recalled.

One day she wrote a letter to Philip A. Payne, managing editor of the News, which must have been a classic. In it, she told all her misfortunes, commencing with the work in that little New England town.

"You must have a sense of humor," Mr. Payne's secretary wrote back, arranging for an appointment for her to meet the managing editor.

She got a job with the News last December.

"How my knees quavered those first few days," Jean Vernon remembered. "The city desk seemed miles and miles away. My hands were like lead, and I could hardly make my typewriter go."

Now she has every right to call herself a newspaper woman.

"And one of the best," adds her city editor.

riders. It was also for the same reason stopped in New Haven.

The Graphic offers "$10,000 awards for ideal Marriages" in another feature, which is believed to be unique in newspaper stunting. It invites ten American Apollos and ten Dianas, eligible for marriage, each in perfect physical condition, to enter a contest. When the 20 are located they will be invited to a dinner. If such acquaintance ripens into love and marriage the Graphic will pay $1,000 to each couple, and an added $100 for each child born within five years. Five prominent clergymen endorsed the stunt in signed appended stories.

In the first number the Graphic presented its "platform." There were 17 planks, among which were: Elimination of all intolerance,, abolishment of governmental censorship, abolishment of graft in politics and business, repeal of legislation preventing ownership of firearms, annulment of "all prohibitory laws infringing constitutional rights," non-medical investigation of healing methods, registration of all citizens to detect crooks, compulsory suffrage, with fines for non-voters annulment of all inactive laws, open-minded attitude toward all progressive legislation, etc.

"I am entering the newspaper field as a crusader. And I expect to make a few million dollars for myself and associates, "was Mr. Macfadden's salutation. He said that money meant nothing to him, save power to serve, and he would not "give three whoops in Hades for all the social honors in the universe." He tells the story of his active and interesting career and says his newspaper motive is to reveal life's truth. "The Truth Shall Make You Free," is quoted throughout the paper.

The mechanical processes of the newspaper were not comparable to other New York tabloid effects, a difficulty to be ironed out. The type appearance, in general, was sprightly and the head-line treatment was novel, the lines being set flush to the right-hand column rule, giving the effect of a half inverted pyramid.

A substantial run of advertising was shown in the first number, including some medical which some newspapers have ruled out. The advertising policy was summed up in a box on page one, of the second number as follows:

The new paper was widely distributed and, whatever its technical faults or initial confusion as regards the publisher's pre-publication announcements of policy, nevertheless it "made 'em talk."

As the staff got its stride later in the week the selection of pictures improved and there was a marked improvement in press work and proof-reading. But the Thursday issue, first edition, has rarely been out-done for yellowness. An hysterical capital punishment picture and story, fit to create panic in the hearts of quiet home folk, was displayed. The artist left nothing to the imagination as regards the terrors of the death chair. The paper has a strong editorial policy against capital punishment and agreed with the sentence to life of Loeb and Leopold.

Two cents was the price of the daily, except Saturday when 5 cents was quoted for a paper to include a 16-page feature story section and an eight-page gravure section.

TELLING FULL STORY BRINGS SALES IN USED CAR CLASSIFIED

Lack of Detailed Description and Use of Hackneyed Selling Phrases Hampers Effectiveness of Medium—Complete Ad Formula Suggested

By RALPH W. ELDEN and CHARLES O. CHATTERTON

HOW many Dodge touring cars are advertised today in the "Automobiles for Sale" sections of the papers of your city? Make it Buicks, Chevrolets, Studebakers, or Fords, if you like, but Dodges will do as well for our purpose.

Enough to make competition interesting? Enough to give any buyer a choice? Enough to make it safe to say no one buyer will see them all?

Very well! Here is a buyer:

He has studied his car problem and his mind is made up. He has a price limit. He knows he can buy a 1922 Dodge within his figure. There are 3 cars that have his approval, but he has centered on one—a Dodge. The money is in his pocket. He can pay $250 down and carry the rest in monthly payments. It remains only to find the car.

Time is worth something. Our buyer follows the course of thousands. He resorts to the want ads for his first clues.

The classified section! Here they are: "Automobiles for Sale."

You know what happens now! Pencil and scissors, and in a half hour our buyer—your buyer, perhaps—has clipped for personal investigation 5 ads among 20.

What determined his choice?

Price was not a controlling factor. It may be later, but not yet. Age was not a consideration. These cars all are 1922 models. Condition did not determine the choice for no one of these cars has been seen.

"COPY."

There in one word is the answer.

A free agent, without prejudice or favor, this buyer has chosen to see 5 cars, and is indifferent to 15. Why? Because 5 ads impressed him and 15 did not.

And mark this! Among the 5 there are still other choices to be made. One dealer shall see this buyer before another, and it is likely that copy again will control each successive choice.

The uninteresting physical form of the want ad has dulled our imagination.

We have not sensed possibilities or relative values.

Rapid movement of the used cars is the crux of every car dealer's problem. Depreciation continues while the cars stand unsold. Sales mean more sales from unexpected and unsought sources. Every element in the situation points to the necessity of rapid action. It can be had by writing want ad copy that:

1. Satisfies the buyer's desire for information.
2. Impresses him by its strong yet reasonable statements.
3. Attracts him by its readable and intersting form.
4. Appeals to his imagination by suggesting the emotional by-products its possession will give.
5. Fixes itself in his mind by an unusual phrase or statement of whenever possible.
6. And makes easy the personal contact that must be made before a sale can be consummated.

Rules cannot be laid down for the writing of successful copy. Principles can be set forth.

Phrases cannot be suggested—universal use promptly would make them worthless.

Here are a group of used car ads clipped at random from a half-dozen papers. The dealers' names and addresses have been changed, otherwise the ads are shown as they appeared.

1920 OLDSMOBILE 6, just overhauled and refinished a beautiful maroon; this is a snappy light six and looks and runs beautifully; must sell today. 732 Grove Street.

FORD chassis, 1924 license, $30 cash, balance monthly. 106 4th St.

1920 FORD roadster, starter, '24 license, car has inclosed box on rear for carrying samples; will sell on easy terms. 106-24th St.

1923 HAYNES 5 PASS.
Sport; bargain
SUNSET MOTOR CO., INC.
Ransom at 24th West 5600
Distributors
Marmon Haynes

These four ads all fail to recognize the importance of detailed description. No price is given in any instance.

The first 3 put upon the buyer the necessity of traveling to the address given and there hunting down "the man who has a car for sale."

"Easy terms," "bargain," "runs beautifully" carry little conviction when there are no supporting facts and the advertiser is unwilling to name his price. These ads in competition with others describing the same models in detail and naming the price, must inevitably be second, third or fourth choices.

Mechanics are likely buyers for older cars, and many times the ad may be pointed straight at a mechanic.

If any of these cars justify such a statement, the words "A lot of satisfactory service in this car yet" would be reassuring to a prospective buyer.

EDITOR WOULD HAVE "VAUDEVILLE STUFF" REPLACED WITH VITAL NEWS

Tom Finty Jr., of Dallas Journal Says Dailies Lisp Baby Talk When They Might Talk Sense—Discusses Newspaper Probe

THE failure of a large section of the American press even to attempt to interest their public in really vital affairs was condemned in no uncertain terms this week by Tom Finty, Jr., editor of the Dallas Journal and associate editor of the Dallas News.

TOM FINTY, JR.

Finty is no mere muckraking spell-binder. A veteran of the editor's desk, a position he reached after an up and down journey from telegraph bench, to lawyer, to reporter and thence upwards through the news and editorial rooms, he has ideals which he practices.

Of gray hair, he is no graybeard, mumbling of the "good old yesterdays." He looks forward to the time when the press will be rather an educator than mere vaudeville performer.

He is of the sort who does not tear down to leave only unsightly rubbish; he rebuilds on firmer foundations; and his condemnation, contained in conversation with the writer this week was followed by pertinent suggestions of lasting quality.

I had found him in an excellent mood for idealism. He had just come through a hard political campaign in Texas, backing the anti-Klan candidate "Ma" Ferguson. Reward for the task that had been his had taken the form of 3 weeks' vacation. He had had the power of the press graphically illustrated to him by this political campaign. That "grand an' glorious feeling" had been experienced on shipboard on the trip north from New Orleans.

Now as we sat together on easy chairs in New York, Finty, far from that exacting business of culling 600,000 words fit to print daily from a messy 6,000,000, could philosophize at ease.

"Newspapers," he declared, "are lisping 'baby talk' to their readers, when they might talk sense to advantage.

"There is a preponderance of jazz in our newspapers. Too much attention is paid to frivolous subjects, and sense is delivered too frequently in the grotesque form of nonsense.

"Crime news is given exaggerated importance far too often."

I recalled at this point the saying, I think it is William Allen White's, that there are two publics, and in consequence there will be two forms of newspapers.

"Is there no room for both?" was hinted.

But Flinty belongs to the school that believes the public intelligence is grossly underestimated by the newspapers, and that there is less difference between the two publics than is generally accepted.

"Newspapers who cater to the moron class prosper for a while, but in adding circulation in one direction they offend the real stable and lasting element on the subscription lists.

"And really, I believe newspapers ought to publish news with interest to society in mind and not solely in regard to circulation.

"Take crime news as an example. I believe in giving crime space in the news columns, but it is how it is played that counts.

"It is a newspaper's privilege to print the proceedings of courts, because the officers are public servants and should be kept before the eyes of the people

"This privilege is abused, however. Many newspapers are not content with giving fair, true and impartial accounts. Reports are exaggerated.

"Newspapers should quit 'trial by newspapers.' Every man is entitled to his day in court, but no newspaper has a right to prejudice his case by forecasting what the testimony is going to be. It is abuse of the dangerous but necessary freedom of the press.

"The newspapers, I realize, are not alone to blame. Countless prosecutors have formed the habit of telling reporters what they intend to prove. This is hardly fair.

"There was a case in the federal court of Wisconsin which comes to mind. The judge called a newspaper publisher before him and reprimanded him for publishing an interview with the district attorney to the effect that the defendant in a certain case up for trial was guilty. He romped all over the publisher, but the really remarkable thing was that he didn't find fault with this district attorney at all."

After this diatribe of friendly criticism, Finty began constructive suggestions, after his fashion.

"How can the newspapers interest its public in really vital subjects?

"It is only necessary to say one thing! Let newspapers put as much talent to work covering serious matters as they put on their sporting pages.

"There are plenty of worth-while subjects a newspaper can take up and not in the muckraking spirit either, which, if well written, are crammed with reader interest.

"The affairs of government, for instance, are being excellently treated today by such men as David Lawrence, Mark Sullivan, and many other well paid intelligent Washington correspondents.

"But on local problems newspapers are unwisely silent.

"Education is a vital subject, isn't it? Well, there is a tendency for newspapers to boost education in the abstract and to exaggerate formal education without inquiring closely into results.

"What we did in Dallas might well be followed elsewhere. We sent a very high-grade reporter, Chester T. Crowell, who has since become a successful magazine writer, to make a careful survey of the Dallas schools. He did not work in a muckraking spirit, but he worked thoroughly. He attended classes, went through the schools generally, and reported just what the Dallas children were being offered in the way of education. This idea originated with the late Caesar Lombardi.

"Last year we made a similar survey of the rural schools of Texas.

Then there are health matters, which a newspaper can delve into in an interesting as well as constructive manner.

"But in doing this sort of work, one must bear in mind that it cannot be handed to the public in a deadly way. It must first be well written to be read."

Naturally, while on the subject of idealism and the press, conversation turned towards the projected scientific investigation of the press, announced in last week's EDITOR & PUBLISHER.

This survey, Finty believes, is capable of doing both a great deal of harm as well as a great deal of good. It depends upon who puts it to work in his opinion.

"If the investigators believe ahead of time that the press is venal and rotten they are likely to get just that for a verdict," he said.

"If they are open minded, their survey may result in eradicating some evils which do beset the publishing business.

"These evils are largely the result of very intense competition. I believe in healthy competition, but I do not agree to its taking a form manifested chiefly in a statistical marathon.

"The survey might do a great deal of good. An editor welcomes local criticism of his paper, why not, then, a general criticism?"

This philosophical Texas editor began his career as a country newspaper correspondent, reporting newsy gossip of the small towns for the Louisville (Ill.) Ledger. He was born at Xenia, Ill.

At 16, he left newspaper work and became a railroad telegrapher. In railroading, he was promoted to the position of freight solicitor, but he was thought too young.

Leaving this work, Finty went into the banking business for a while, then he studied law and moved to Texas where he began to practice. When he was 27, he gave up a good law practice to become a reporter on the Galveston (Tex.) Tribune at $20 a week. This was in 1894. Within 2 months he was made city editor, which position he held for 3 years and then transferred to the same desk on the Galveston News. On the News he was made political editor, and continued in this department until the Dallas Journal was founded in 1914 and he was made its editor.

BABEL REPORTING AT LEAGUE ASSEMBLY

London Daily News Reporter at Geneva Says Work Is No Joke—"Pool" of Shorthand Writers Takes Speeches

HERBERT C. RIDOUT
(London Editor, EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

LONDON, Sept. 8.—The sympathies of every newspaper man who has attempted to cover a meeting subjected to cross-talk and interruptions will go out to the men who are trying to tell the world what is happening at the Assembly of the League of Nations at Geneva.

The difficulties under which they labor are told by the London Daily News representatives, S. J. Jennings.

According to Jennings, the official reporting at Geneva is no joke.

The verbatim notes at all the plenary sittings are taken by a "pool" of shorthand writers taking 10 minute turns. A writer may be called upon to report any kind of speech, by an English, or French delegate, or by some delegate who speaks English or French as a foreign language. An Asiatic member often leaves one in doubt at the opening of the speech whether it is in English or French.

The whispered conversations going on both on the floor and in the galleries by people who are not interested or do not happen to understand the language being used increase the reporter's task. Sometimes he has to stand near the speaker and write, notebook in hand.

Taking down the interpretations is even more difficult. The interpreters are all fluent, fluency being one of the qualifications. This might be no drawback, but the majority of the audience, having understood the original, regard the translation as a formality and thus give themselves up to conversation. The reporter therefore finds himself standing beneath the interpreter in a storm of talk, notebook in hand, struggling to take down a speech rattled off at perhaps two hundred words a minute.

At the end of his term the writer dictates direct to a typist cutting a stencil for the copying machine, and he must be able to remove obscurities and correct errors of form as he goes along.

MATTHEW TIGHE, DEAN OF WASHINGTON CORRESPONDENTS, DIES

Government Officials Mourn Passing of Capital Veteran Who Was Friend of Presidents and Cabinet Members —Covered Spanish-American War

By SAM BELL

(Washington Correspondent, EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

MATTHEW FITZSIMMONS TIGHE, recognized dean of the Washington newspaper correspondents and at once baiter and friend of all the Presidents, State, War and Navy Secretaries of the last quarter century is dead. Colonel Tighe, as he was affectionately known when addressed in the proper title of his rank as officer on the staff of Governor "Ben Tillman of South Carolina, passed away at his Washington home Wednesday after an illness due to cerebral hemmorrage suffered early last March. The rally he made from the first attack led his friends to hope for recovery but a second shock several weeks ago brought him rapidly to his death. Mr. Tighe was 67 years old.

M. F. TIGHE

Until his last illness there had been only one short hiatus in Colonel Tighe's eventful career as a newspaper man,—that when he came to Washington from Charleston as secretary to Senator Tillman. The humdrum life of senatorial secretary soon palled and Tighe went back to the newspapers, taking a job on the old Washington Times, beginning his long, brilliant, and picturesque Washington service.

Born in Charleston, Sept. 29, 1857, young Tighe received his early education in a private school. He was graduated from the College of Charleston and carried a real scholarly training into the office of the Charleston News and Courier when he became a feature writer on the staff of that paper. The Greek, Latin and French and the knowledge of literature he absorbed in college remained with him. He added to that knowledge throughout his career as active newspaper reporter, and while he became as proficient as the next in the touch and go of the old newspaper methods of the twentieth century he remained essentially a product of old school journalism. His tilts with Presidents and cabinet officers to say nothing of his discussions with as erudite a person as Newton D. Baker, formerly secretary of war, already have taken their places among Washington newspaper legends.

One story includes a question he directed at the austere Elihu Root, when Mr. Root was secretary of state.

"Do you think Mr. Secretary there is any truth in the story I wrote this morning?" Colonel Tighe once asked of the solemn Mr. Root as he stood waiting before a group of rather tongue-tied reporters.

Philander Chase Knox, who followed Mr. Root as custodian of the State portfolio, was exceptionally fond of Colonel Tighe but had his own views of some of the stories the Colonel wrote for the Hearst papers about foreign affairs. Mr. Knox thought some of them highly indiscreet to say the least.

Once Secretary Knox was discussing one of the stories with a group of newspaper men—remonstrating with them about it.

"But, Mr. Secretary," said one correspondent rushing to Colonel Tighe's defense, "he is the Nestor of the Washington corps."

"True enough," acknowledged Mr. Knox grimly, "one might almost say the mare's nestor."

Colonel Tighe's first big story was the Charleston earthquake and he wrote it sitting in Battery Park in the old Southern town, hoping that in some way the organization of the Charleston News and Courier might be reassembled to print it.

After a turn on the old Washington Times, he went to the New York Journal bureau in Washington in 1898, and was the first man assigned by Mr. Hearst to the opening phases of the Spanish-American war. He was rushed to Havana upon the sinking of the Maine and wrote some of the first stories of the report on the sinking of the vessel. He returned to Washington before the actual declaration of hostilities and played an important part in covering the news at the capital during the conflict.

He is credited with a beat on the sinking of Cevera's fleet.

The funeral was held at the Church of the Sacred Heart in Washington Friday and the body taken to Charleston for burial.

STRENUOUS AMERICAN NEWSPAPER LIFE ASTONISHES FLEET STREET VETERAN

Trevor Wignall of the London Daily Mail Praises Our Facilities for Handling News—Covered Prince's Voyage and Firpo Fight

By NELSON PHILLIPS

FLEET STREET came to New York this week with a London journalist. Trevor C. Wignall, boxing expert of the London Daily Mail, fiction writer, and author of a history of the prize ring, hit Manhattan with a Welsh accent and a host of tales about "Dear Old Blighty's" journalistic row.

T. C. WIGNALL

Primarily in the United States to report the Prince of Wales' trip over on the Berengaria and secondarily to cover the Firpo-Wills fight, Wignall can tell a story of his rise from cub reporter in the Provinces to a comfortable position in Fleet street that forms an English edition of "A Book About Myself" by Theodore Dreiser.

Wignall is rather a traveler. He was a private in the Boer War, where he learned about South Africa. Only last January he spent considerable time in Southern France writing a series of articles for the Daily Mail on the sporting situation in that section. More recently he visted Vienna and Prague for the same purpose.

But, now, in America at last he is "more astonished than ever before." He is astonished particularly at American hospitality and American newspaper methods.

New York's newspaper club has had a hand in this astonishment; likewise Irving S. Cobb, Kelcey Allan, dramatic reviewer for the Fairchild Publications; Tom Rice of the Brooklyn Eagle, and a host of other individuals.

I met him this week at his room in the Belmont Hotel, New York. It was after noon, but Wignall, in gorgeous bathgown patterned fantastically in a gold silk design was at breakfast, brought him from the hotel restaurant.

"My goodness!" he ejaculated, or words to that effect, between tea sips, "I've never seen anything like it in my life."

This gasp referred collectively to American hopitality and American newspaper methods.

"Here I've tickets to every show in town, all the polo matches, and already a fine night at the New York Newspaper Club to look back to," he continued.

"Nothing like it in London—nothing.

"And as for American newspaper methods, there is no comparison between England and America.

"Here newspapers seem provided with all conceivable facilities for handling news events, while in England it seems as though obstacles were always being put in the way of the press.

"In America the press comes first; in England the press comes last.

"Your telegraph arrangements are better than I have seen in any country in the world. You are furnished facilities by the government, business authorities, amusement promoters, and telegraph companies, while in England we have to make our own arrangements on every story.

"In all towns but six in the Provinces, the telegraph companies even close down after 7 o'clock and a reporter has to telephone his story in by long distance after that hour.

"But one thing I am very thankful for, there is not the hurry-skurry in English newspaper offices that there is in America.

"On the Mail the first edition is run off at 10:30 P. M. with other editions following until 2 o'clock. One isn't asked to rush to make an edition. Typewriters are not commonly used, and it is a less toilsome life generally.

"Of course there has been a terrific change since I have been on Fleet street. In 1908 when I had my first job there I was paid only £4 a week. It was the custom then for reporters to have only one assignment a day, whether it took only 5 minutes or several hours to cover. They were not difficult jobs either; a lunch at the Savoy, say, an interview with some prominent man, or something of that sort.

"Newspaper work was horribly ill paid. But, due to Lord Northcliffe, and the National Union of Journalists, the standards of journalism have been raised very high. Now £9 per week is the minimum, with salaries ranging up to as high as £2,500 a year for feature writers."

"What chance has an American newspaper man in London?", was of course the next question.

"Well, qualified Wignall, "the average American newspaper reporter coming to England will probably suffer from the poor reputations of several decidedly second rate Americans who came to London and fell down badly on their jobs.

"But good newspaper men, if they do not patronize the pubs too frequently, can easily find work on some London newspapers, especially if they are specialists in something."

Wignall thinks the game in America is far too strenuous. Nothing would make him give up English newspaper work entirely. He recalls that he was even advised once by no less a person than Lord Northcliffe to give up newspaper work and devote all his time to fiction.

Lord Northcliffe's advice as told by Wignall is interesting.

"One thing a newspaper man ought to learn early," Northcliffe told Wignall, "and that is that it is impossible to do both newspaper work and fiction. Let him either stick to newspaper work completely or leave it.

"And," Northcliffe continued "there is one book every newspaper man should read, and that is 'East Lynne.'"

Wignall was given this advice in 1911. He quit a position of news editor on Sporting Life and started to write fiction and nothing else. He has continually drifted back to Fleet street, although he has established himself as a fiction writer, and now persists in doing both.

"The irony of it," he told the writer, "was that for 11 months I never even sold a comma."

He was about to return to Fleet street a failure as a fiction writer, when a magazine editor ordered a boy's story from him. He wrote it in a week and had it accepted. Since then, although he returned to Fleet street eventually, he has had continued success at fiction writing. He has written 16 novels, 500 short stories, and a book called "The Story of Boxing," which has also been published in this country.

Wignall fell into newspaper work by accident. When he was little more than 16 years old, his father became temporarily blind, and he had to leave school to help his family. At first he was an errand boy in a draper's shop, and then in turn, barber's assistant, dock laborer and clerk in a labor union office.

He was 17 when the Boer War broke out and he joined the volunteer regiment in his home town of Swansea, Wales. He sailed for South Africa in January, 1900, the "youngest private soldier in the British Army." He was in the service a year and ten months, and during that time he wrote long letters home from the front. The editor of the Swansea newspaper, the Cambria Daily Post, got hold of one of the letters and began printing them in his paper.

When Wignall returned home he was offered a job as a reporter on the Cambria Post and accepted.

"My first assignment," Wignall recalled "was when a huge wall of sand fell and buried 6 men. I didn't know the first thing about newspaper reporting, but I wrote the story as though I were writing a letter, and I have continued this method ever since."

After 4 years, Wignall became quite a success in the Provinces. He was made chief sporting writer on the South Wales Daily Post. About this time Charles Watney, then news editor of the late London Standard offered him work on his newspaper.

Wignall went to London in "fear and trembling." He made an agreement with Watney that he would work one week for nothing and if he proved a failure in Fleet street, he would return to the Provinces.

His first assignment in London was of the "trial variety." Watney wanted to find out just what sort of a man he had brought in from the Provinces. He ordered Wignall to go out and find the exact number of unemployed men, women, and children in every London borough.

Of course Wignall didn't know London. He left the newspaper office dispondently and spent a very bad day of homesickness in a cafe across the street. It occurred to him that the assignment was in the nature of a test and that everything depended upon the imagination he could bring to play in making an excuse. At 4 o'clock in the afternoon, he made his mind he would quit Fleet street.

On his way to Paddington Station, he met an old friend of his father's who was connected with the Board of Trade Gazette. Then, as Wignall explains it, "one of those things that never happen outside of fiction" occurred. This man had all the statistics that Wignall had been ordered to find. They were all prepared in galley proofs to be printed in about three weeks in the Board of Trade Gazette.

"When I brought in the story," Wignall remembered, "the most astonished person I ever saw was the editor."

Wignall remained with the Standard about 2 years. Then he left with Watney to establish the London Evening Times, a newspaper that lived about 12 months. Others in this enterprise were John Cowley, now chairman of the board of directors of the London Daily Mirror; Bernard B. Falk, now editor of the London Weekly Dispatch; Edgar Wallace, now a novelist; and J. S. Little, retired. After this venture, Wignall became news editor of Sporting Life.

When the World War started, Wignall rejoined the army as a private, later receiving a 2nd Lieutenant's commission. Re-entering newspaper work following the armistice, he joined the Daily Mail as boxing expert, and has held this position ever since.

"I don't go out to report a prize fight from an expert's point of view," he explained. "I write boxing for the man in the street, always bearing in mind that letter writing flair of mine, which started me as a newspaper reporter."

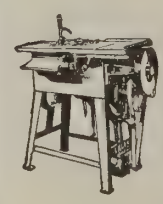
From Washington (D. C.) Post

"RECENTLY one of our Ludlow Compositors cast 636 display lines in 7 hours with only one error" writes George W. Brandt, foreman of the Washington (D. C.) Post. (On a regular run of work, an average of 91 lines per hour for setting matrices, casting the slugs and distributing the matrices.)



"In December, 1922, the Ludlow System was installed in The Washington Post, supplanting another system in use for ten years.

"Column cost has been shattered since its installation, and I can truthfully state that the Ludlow deserves 75 per cent of the credit for this saving.

"Another good point in favor of the Ludlow is the small amount of floor space it occupies. Our two Ludlows and six cabinets use only 96 square feet of space.

"There never has been a "sink" in the face of any of our Ludlow lines. The appearance of the paper has never been better.

"The Ludlow has shown several improvements in the past few months which add to the merits of the machine and it is my firm belief that the Ludlow has a very bright future."

LUDLOW QUALITY COMPOSITION

Our Own World of Letters

By JAMES MELVIN LEE

CLARENCE W. WAGENER, who is connected with the Promotion and Publicity Department of the Baltimore Sun, after a careful study of the different phases of life found in towns of limited population, has made his analysis public through a volume entitled "What the Small Town Needs" (Fischer Printing Company, Baltimore). He is to be congratulated upon the way in which he has steered his survey between the Scylla of carping ciritism and the Charybdis of platitudinous praise.

After a careful perusal of the volume I am somewhat surprised that Mr. Wagener has overlooked the thing most needed—a good community weekly. Several years ago a New York periodical offered a prize for the best essay on "The Best Thing in Our Town." The prize went to a man who described a country weekly in a little town in Missouri. Similar conditions obtain in many other villages. Incidentally, Mr. Wagener lists those things which should have the active editorial support of local papers.

THE first attempt to answer nationally for the wood-using industry and for the consuming public the question of an adequate permanent future timber supply will be found in "How the United States Can Meet Its Present And Future Pulp-Wood Requirements." Newspaper publishers who have not already received a copy of this government bulletin may obtain one gratis upon application to U. S. Department of Agriculture, Forest Service, Washington.

THE latest volume in the Journalism Series published by the School of Journalism, University of Missouri has its title "Women and the Newspaper." It contains addresses and discussions originally given at the Fifteenth Annual Journalism Week.

Sara L. Lockwood, Assistant Professor of Journalism, contributes an introduction and admirably indicates the contents when she says:

> The addresses given here make no attempt to cover all the opportunities for women writers. Writing special interviews and features for Sunday magazine sections and periodicals; conducting children's pages or writing for children's magazines; political writing; conducting newspaper columns; organizing and keeping in workable order a newspaper library; writing for or editing trade publications; teaching journalism in high schools or colleges—all of these things were brought out in discussions as offering opportunities for women journalists.

A copy of this pamphlet may be obtained from Walter Williams, Dean of School of Journalism, Columbia, Missouri.

THE death of H. W. Massingham, editor for many years of the London Nation, drew forth many tributes from American newspapers and periodicals. One of the best of these is that found in the New Republic for Sept. 10.

THE International Relations Section of The Nation for September 10 outlines somewhat in detail the attempts of Mussolini to gag the press in Italy.

Action may be taken:

> If the newspaper or periodical, by false or misleading news causes any interference in the diplomatic action of the Government in its foreign relations, or hurts the credit of the nation at home or abroad, causing undue alarm among the people, or in any way disturbs the public peace.
> If the newspaper or periodical, by editorial articles, notes, titles, illustrations, or inserts, incites to crime or to class hatred or to disobedience of the laws of established order, or upsets the discipline of those engaged in public service, or favors the interests of foreign states, groups, or persons as opposed to Italian interests, or insults the nation, the King, the royal family, the Summo Pontifex, the religion, the institutions, or the authority of the state or of friendly Powers.

Before this issue of The Nation is put down one should glance at "Fashions and Newspapers Hoaxes" in which the story of the famous moon hoax of the old New York Sun is retold.

SEVERAL universities, not only in Europe but also in Asia, have selected "Deadlines," that newspaper classic by Henry Justin Smith, formerly news editor of the Chicago Daily News, as a text to be read in the classes specializing in modern English. From other sources come equally high praise for the book as one of the finest examples in which there is a charm of style combined with a force of expression. Smith has left the editorial rooms of the Chicago Daily News to go to the ivy-clad halls of University of Chicago where, at least on state occasions, he will wear the customary cap and gown.

THE Washington Newspaper for August, 1924, includes in its covers an article by James W. Fisk, Merchandising Counsel, the Milwaukee Journal, called "Service in Selling Retail Advertising." The Washington Newspaper is the official organ of the School of Journalism connected with the University of Washington at Seattle.

EDWARD P. MITCHELL continues his chat about Dana and his newspaper in Scribner's Magazine for September in an article entitled "Mr. Dana and His People." In it he tells a lot about the men who worked with Dana on the New York Sun.. Personally, the chat is too brief about Frank Church, whom I regard as one of the greatest editorial writers in the history of American journalism. But this is only a personal impression.

The chat about Mayo W. Hazeltine, who was literary editor of the Sun under Dana, is a fine piece of character drawing. So little has been published about book-reviewing that I have yielded to temptation to quote the following paragraph on how Hazeltine turned the trick:

> M. W. H.'s general manner of reviewing was to bring out the best there was in the book under consideration, bestowing upon it his own resources of knowledge and judgment in a friendly, rather than a hostile spirit. If the thing did not seem worth while, or was bad enough to excite his contempt, he did not say so, but let it alone. No lack of the critical faculty was implied in this generosity of attitude, for the estimates recorded by Hazeltine, particularly in his earlier reviews—some of which were collected and published by the Scribners in 1883, under the title "Chats about Books"—have the subtlety and searching quality of Sainte-Beuve. But Hazeltine's tolerance increased as his reputation became more magisterial. Unexcelled in the art of paraphrase, his longer reviews, occupying a whole page in The Sun every Sunday, became more and more an exposition of the meritorious contents of the volume, without direct citation and interpreted at every point by the reviewer's fruitful, illuminating scholarship.

In another paragraph Mr. Mitchell adds:

> Hazeltine's conviction was firm that the readers' interest was primarily in the book and its author, rather than in the personality of another writer, the reviewer.

I sincerely hope that the current issue of Scribner's will have a wide reading among literary editors.

Another one of Dana's people was Thomas Hitchcock, a prominent figure for many years in metropolitan finance and, in a certain sense, the financial editor of the Sun (in the ownership of which he came next to the "big boss.") Mr. Mitchell has some interesting things to say about Hitchcock but nothing more startling than:

> It was to Mr. Hitchcock, in the temporary absence of Dana, that Sheriff Jimmy O'Brien submitted the Tweed Ring accounts and incriminating documents in the summer of 1871, when O'Brien decided to strike his blow of vengeance. Mr. Hitchcock was naturally unwilling to assume the responsibility, and the sheriff, unable to reach Dana, carried the Ring figures to George Jones of the Times, dumped the bundle and left without sitting down.

As a sort of postscript I want to mention one other individual listed by Mr. Mitchell—Mr. A—an old circus advance agent who found a comfortable chair in later years in the editorial rooms of the Sun.

And down in Miami

—that hospitable southern city and resort where thousands of Northerners take refuge from ice and snow in America's most perfect climate, the Miami Herald and News keep tourist and resident alike supplied with complete local, national and international news.

BRITISH DAILIES FINED FOR PRINTING CRIME NEWS BEFORE TRIAL

Held in Contempt by Judge and Warned that Imprisonment Waits Second Offense for Reporting Murder Case American Style

By HUGH J. HARTLEY

FINES approximating $7,000 and a warning that imprisonment had been barely escaped were visited on 3 important British newspapers recently, because they had investigated a murder mystery in approved American newspaper style and had published detailed accounts of the case in advance of the trial.

The judgment given by the Lord Chief Justice of the Divisional Court was by no means extraordinary. It represented the usual practice of the British courts in dealing with newspapers which publish evidence in a criminal case, and are held in contempt of court because it is presumed they have interfered with the police and prejudiced the rights of the prosecution or the defense or both.

Such an attitude seems unbelievable to the average American who reads daily the details of criminal cases and wonders why the newspapers don't ferret out the wrong-doers and expose police bungling or negligence when the perpetrators are not brought to justice promptly.

It may seem less credible still to learn that some leaders of opinion in this country urge that the British censorship system should be placed in effect in the United States for the public welfare. The Chicago Tribune recently declared that too much publicity is given by the newspapers to crimes and to persons accused but untried. It urged the enactment of a law limiting the freedom of the press in this respect and forbidding more than a brief mention of crimes until those charged with committing them were brought into court. The general verdict of editors seemed to be for complete freedom. That some newspapers have exceeded the bounds of decency, is admitted. Some have unduly played up cases to make sensations, or have taken sides, viciously, in a case to come before the courts.

Seldom has an American newspaper been accused of obstructing justice or concealing clues to crime. Its efforts usually have been directed to the protection or acquittal of the innocent and the bringing of the guilty to justice.

The public generally has appreciated such service and has placed a sort of awed reliance in the terrible power wielded by the press for the common welfare in the solution of criminal mysteries. Newspapers have gone far, too, in exposing corruption at the very bar of justice and have gotten away with it.

What a shock it would be, therefore, for an American reader to learn that his favorite newspaper had been accused of the heinous crime of "sending to the scene of the crime investigators—newspaper detectives—to make inquiries, house to house search for witnesses, in order to have them make statements of fact for publication."

That was the indictment of the Attorney General in the case of the King against the Manchester Guardian, the London Evening Standard and the London Daily Express, along with a number of other smaller papers which copied the articles printed in those publications on a bungalow murder mystery which became famous in England last spring under the name of the "Crumbles Case."

Patrick Mahon, a young married man of good family and comfortable income, had carried on an illicit affair for some time with a girl named Emily Kaye, beautiful, talented, and with a considerable competence. The couple met frequently, and as Mahon's ardor began to cool, many quarrels ensued. Finally, Mahon rented a bungalow some distance from London, named "The Crumbles." Later, portions of the girl's dismembered and half-burned body were found, and an investigation revealed a revolting murder and the gruesome fact that Mahon had entertained another young woman of his acquaintance at the bungalow almost before the body of his murdered sweetheart was cold.

Here were all the elements of a sensational murder case. Police news on the case evidently was not plentiful or convincing, and so several big newspapers took up the case in American style, and their columns blazed with illustrations and headlines fit to scandalize conservative British tastes.

In due time the courts disposed of Mahon, who was sentenced to death, but meanwhile they also took up the case of contempt against the newspapers. Counsel for the defendant publications included many of the most distinguished counsel in England, but the horror-stricken recitals of the Attorney General of the articles which had been published made all their efforts fruitless. He placed before the court a full-page special article, entitled "The Tragedy of Mrs. Patrick Mahon. Full Story of Her Marriage Romance by a Personal Friend."

The Attorney General said that there was a fundamental principle of justice which was affected by all publications of any relevant matter during the course either of a trial or during the period in which the accused was under remand or arrest. It was impossible for any person to know to what extent the life-story of an accused man, either in relation to his wife, or in relation to any other person, might be even vitally relevant to the trial when it came on. It was not for a newspaper to make inquiries and publish matter of a sensational nature, and it was contempt of court for any newspaper to make such inquiries with a view to publication.

One exhibit was an article, entitled "Another Crumbles Puzzle. Was the Girl Dead When Her Letter Was Posted?" There was published a letter said to have been written by Miss Kaye to a friend in which she referred to being engaged to Mahon. The defense counsel admitted that applying a fair test it might be said that the publication of such a letter might tend to interfere with the trial of Mahon. Yet he said one could not shut one's eyes to developments in the case as they occurred.

The court was severe in its criticism of this article, and the defense counsel pleaded that newspapers could be prosecuted for libel under the law if what they said was incorrect or malicious.

Another complaint concerned Miss Ethel Duncan, the young woman who had been entertained by Mahon after the murder took place. It was alleged that Miss Duncan had been questioned by the police and warned not to make a statement, but that representatives of Evening Standard saw her also and obtained information and a promise not to give a statement to anybody but themselves. They were doubtful whether she would remain faithful against the wiles of other newspapers, however, and therefore arranged that she should stay with the wife of one of the sub-editors at a watering place. The defense pleaded that Miss Duncan had not told them that she had been instructed to secrecy by the police.

At that the Attorney General opened with his batteries in earnest. He said he viewed the case with the greatest anxiety. It was essential in the interests of justice on both sides that the police should have the unfettered power of making inquiries into possible evidence, and also that the defense should not be prejudiced by persons publishing statements which might at any time become vital to the defense. Publications like this might do irreparable harm. Counsel for the defendant newspapers had argued that what had happened was not a contempt of court. It was most unfortunate that it should be possible for such an argument to be put forward. The deliberate policy adopted through these publications was to send to the scene of the crime investigators—newspaper detectives—to make inquiries. They made house to house search for witnesses to make statements of fact for publication. The Attorney General added that he hoped it would not be possible in future for any newspaper to come before the court and argue that such publications were not contempt of court. Their inquiries hampered the police and the course of justice, and he asked their Lordships to establish once for all that such a policy should not continue. It would be eminently desirable to find out who was responsible for the policy of sending down these investigators. In the future it might be well to ask the court to allow the cross-examination of editors who said that they did not see a particular article, with the view of finding out who was the person or body of persons responsible for this class of publication.

The Manchester Guardian pleaded that publicity of sensational crime was no part of its policy and that it devoted as little space as possible to matter of that kind. The paper did not have investigators who made independent inquiries, but in this case, as the woman was a Manchester girl, they sent down one of their ordinary reporting staff. Even Homer sometimes nodded, the Guardian's counsel said, and the newspaper humbly apologized for this temporary aberration of judgment.

A similar admission was made by counsel for the Daily Express, and he explained that the newspaper employed a member of the Bar of 40 years' standing, whose duty it was to go through the proofs, and in the mistaken belief that there was nothing to which exception could be taken, he had passed the matter.

The Lord Chief Justice declared that it was apparent to the court that the matters complained of were likely to interfere with the administration of the criminal law. He did not propose, because he thought it might be prejudicial under the circumstances, to single out particular matters or particular phrases, and show by reference exactly in what way each might be likely to affect the fair trial of the accused person.

It was clear, he said, that some of these newspapers had entered deliberately and systematically on a course which was described by some of them as "criminal investigation." It was urged by one of the defendants that it was part of the duty of a newspaper when a criminal case was pending to elucidate the facts. The court said such a suggestion led to something like this: that while the police of the Criminal Investigation Department were to pursue their investigations in silence and with all reticence and reserve, being careful to say nothing to prejudice the trial of the case, either from the viewpoint of the prosecution or the defense, it has come to be the duty of newspapers to employ a staff of amateur detectives who would bring to an ignorance of the law of evidence a complete disregard of the interests both of the prosecution and the defense.

This was absolutely wrong and against the interests of justice, he said. Therefore, he fined the Evening Standard, which had shown a deliberate effort to conduct its own investigation of the case and publish the results despite the police and the courts, 1,000 pounds and costs. The Manchester Guardian and the Daily Express were fined 300 pounds apiece, and several other defendants were fined 100 pounds apiece. Under certain circumstances, if they had been brought out in the trial, it would have been the duty of the court to employ the penalty of imprisonment, and if the practice were repeated the court would not again be disposed to adopt the merciful alternative of a fine.

Those who would restrict the freedom of the newspapers in dealing with crime cases in this country point to the English law and cite the much lower crime rate, especially of murders, in England as compared with this country. The American Bar admit that criminal procedure in this country is in need of reform—should be speeded up and punishments made more stern and more nearly certain. The general feeling of fear that the innocent will be punished has permitted the admission of evidence which would be considered absurd or dishonest in English courts and simply would not be tolerated.

ALL IN THE DAY'S WORK

Drawn Exclusively for EDITOR & PUBLISHER

By BUD COUNIHAN
He Started on Chalk Plates

"BUD" COUNIHAN, one of the New York Evening World's galaxy of cartoonists, describes his career in the following manner:

"My first experience as a newspaper cartoonist, was on the Norwich (Conn.) Bulletin, carving out sport events on chalk plates. After a year or so of spoiling a flock of perfectly good plates, I received an offer from the Providence Journal to do sports—worked a year on the Journal, then took on the Brooklyn Times for a year, covering sports, politics and banquets.

"I next broke out on the Philadelphia Times, as sport cartoonist doing a baseball strip called—"Luke M'Glook, the Bush League Bear-Cat," while resting.

"The Washington Post, was next on the list. While working on the Post, I received my real big chance—the same being an offer from Mr. John T. Tennant, managing editor of the New York Evening World to do a comic strip for the back page—and here I am."

'Twasn't a Cow—R. F. P.

To EDITOR & PUBLISHER: In your issue of Sept. 6, I observed an announcement by Bob Satterfield, artist of the Perry Service, that he was "kicked into art by a cow," which is tough on yours truly, who is no cow and who certainly did more than any mere cow toward putting Bob into newspaper art.

Bob's first assignments, on the Cleveland Press, 'way back in 1892 or 1792, resulted in pictures of a horse with a cloven hoof and a dog with leg joints bending the wrong way. It took more than a cow to kick those art ideals into him and I'll make oath that it took an entire editorial staff to kick them out of him. However, in those days, you didn't see many Press cartoons hung up in the salons, and Bob, with his anatomical weaknesses ironed out of his drawings, soon made a great "following" by the action of his product.

I recall that, on one occasion, a snappy political cartoon was in the making. "Fine, Bob, fine!" I said. "Now just put a little yellow dog under that wagon to represent Boss Blank!"

"Sat" bounded in his chair, in enthusiasm over the idea, but suddenly became quite sober and, looking up, quietly remarked, "I don't think I can draw a little yellow dog in black and white."

NEW PLANT OF NEW ORLEANS STATES READY FOR OCCUPANCY

WHAT the management claims will be the "largest and most efficient newspaper publishing plant in the South," will be occupied, Oct. 1, by the New Orleans States.

Last November the States purchased the 4-story Fairbanks building for $250,000, and necessary changes to meet newspaper needs are now nearly completed. The newspaper has furnished its new home with new octuple press, a new 4-color press, and additional linotypes.

Besides the present main building of the States, the paper leases two floors of the Tudor building and one of the Interstate. One floor alone of the Fairbanks building contains almost as much space as all the area The States now has in these three buildings. The measurements of the Fairbanks building proper are 158 feet 6 inches on St. Joseph street, and 145 feet 6 inches on Camp. Each floor contains 22,000 square feet.

The enormous size of each floor and the big drive way on the two inner sides of the block permit prompt handling of paper stock and the delivery of newspapers.

On each side of the main entrance are the general offices; on the left, the advertising department; on the right, the business office, the bookkeeping department, auditing department, and the cashier. In the rear of the advertising department is the copy service department with artists and copy writers. In the rear of the service department, the circulation department has very large quarters, opening out under the rear shed where newsboys and carriers are served.

To the rear of the business office is the press room, occupying one-quarter of the lower floor. Presses are mounted on concrete foundations in the basement, and extend up nearly to the ceiling of the first floor. Papers are delivered by conveyors directly to the circulation department where the newsboys and carriers are served. Adjoining the press room towards the center of the building is a spacious shower bath for the pressmen.

On the second floor to the front are the editorial offices, with the publisher's office at the corner of Camp and St. Joseph streets. Other editorial executives are placed on the Camp street front, and on the right is the general news room with Associated Press wires.

Back of the executive offices are the reception rooms, library, and file rooms. Then, comes the composing room across the entire building. In the extreme right, back of the composing room, is the stereotype room. To the left of the stereotype room is the photo-engraving department. Marble shower baths are also provided for the workers on the second floor.

On the fourth floor in a private office, segregated from the rest of the plant, are the leased wires for the Universal and International News Service.

Robert Ewing is publisher of the States.

WHAT OUR READERS SAY

The American Plan in Ohio

MANSFIELD, Ohio, September 2, 1924

TO EDITOR & PUBLISHER:—The article in your last issue, entitled, "N. Y. Papers Must Proofread 'Bogus' by New Arbitration Ruling," is interesting and also a source of pity for the publishers of New York who are bound, hands and feet, by the International Typographical Union.

Here in Mansfield, the Mansfield News has freed itself from this grasping organization and is operating on the American Plan, a situation that abounds in satisfaction to three parties—the publishers, the advertisers and the printers. We are not now a victim of that wasteful "bogus" law. The men and women of our composing room are not handicapped by the unjust laws of a labor union and the advertisers are not compelled to pay for something that they do not get.

It has been a hard fight, we both admit and take pride. But we are over the hill and are in a position in which we can give honest service, get honest service and also have that peace of mind of knowing that our satisfied co-operators in our mechanical department will be on the job tomorrow ready and willing and anxious to give a full 8 hours' work for their eight hours' pay.

The American Plan with us is not a wage cutting movement. Last year in our composing room our 5 highest paid men each made $660 more than the five highest paid men under the union conditions. We borrow Maurice Ketten's expression—"Can You Beat It?" These men were paid higher wages because they deserved them. The drones have been weeded out. The producer is encouraged and, better than all, the apprentice is given his opportunity to learn the machine without the long period of apprenticeship which the union demands.

New York Magazine publishers are coming to Ohio. Why? They are seeking the Promised Land of Industrial Freedom. It is unfortunate that the newspapers cannot take the same course.

May I add that circulation is going up, that we gained 30 per cent in advertising over last year and two years ago and that our advertising rates are the second lowest in Ohio.

Making Radio Sections

TO EDITOR & PUBLISHER:

In a recent issue you ran an article on "making a radio section" by Mr. Bragdon of the New York Sun. May I differ with him on some points?

I believe there are three general types of copy necessary in a radio section or column: Current radio news, including programs; features, popular and technical; and correspondence with fans and amateurs on all phases of the art and industry.

Mr. Bragdon says syndicate material is of little value. Perhaps this is true of technical matter, but it cannot be true in the case of news and popular features. No paper can survive without a general news service, which is certainly a syndicate. Radio news services of national or international scope are necessary to the successful radio editor of a daily paper.

The article states that few purchasers of radio syndicates are to be found. The contrary is the fact. The material furnished is neither technical nor theoretical; it is news, covering the activities of government, commercial, amateur, broadcasting, manufacturing and private interests and features on radio developments and its legion of followers. Radio news, like sporting, financial and automobile news, is now written and syndicated by specialists. Such services, covering national and international events in the radio world, as sports, women's affairs and popular science are handled, are of as great interest in New York as in Los Angeles.

There was considerable radio news in the world flight, Defense Day broadcasts, political campaigns, the proposed trips of the Shenandoah and ZR-3, and dozens of other daily occurrences. In the Nation's Capital there is seldom a dearth of special radio news. Each week there are announcements of national and international interest. The handling of such copy requires the service of a radio expert.

There is still considerable interest in technical data and "how-to-make-it" articles, as Mr. Bragdon points out, but only about one in a family of newspaper readers is concerned with theory and practice, which is covered well in radio magazines and text books. The rest of the home readers, the writer believes, care more for items of news which back up the daily programs. After all, the chief object of radio is communication in its several forms. The average reader is curious about the future of broadcasting, new stations, inter-connections making possible national broadcasts, improvements described popularly and briefly, standards in the industry, the artists they hear, and special events scheduled—in other words, the radio news. Mr. Bragdon comes nearest to the actual prime interest of readers, when he mentions the romantic and industrial phases of radio communications, but he has neglected to recognize the vital value of radio news.

Very truly yours,

CARL H. BUTMAN, Mgr.
Washington Radio News Service.

ROCKEFELLERS DISCLAIM PRESS PROBE

embodied in any affirmative or definite action.

"Subsequent to the conference in May, one of the foundations of the country, not affiliated with the various Rockefeller institutions, tentatively suggested that $25,000 might be available from that source to carry on certain phases of the work, if undertaken. Mr. Walter Rogers advises, however, that even that tentative suggestion could not be considered as morally binding, even if accepted, and it certainly has not been accepted by the committee, and no plans have been perfected for spending that or any other sum of money.

"This statement may be regarded as authoritative in so far as it states the acts and policies of either Messrs. John D. Rockefeller, Senior or Junior. As to what may be done in the further development of the plan referred to, or in subsequent conferences which may be held, the proper source of information is Mr. Walter S. Rogers, the Cosmos Club, Washington, D. C.

(Signed) "Ivy L. Lee."

Informed that Mr. Lee had challenged the accuracy of his article in Editor & Publisher, Dr. William T. Ellis, at Swarthmore, Pa., prepared the following statement:

"This is one of the occasions when careful reporting is openly vindicated. There is nothing to take back or to explain away.

"Every line of my story is substantiated by the written statements of Dr. H. A. Miller, of the Ohio State University, the man in working charge of the investigation, which he courteously made in response to my request for information.

"I send you herewith a copy of Dr. Millers' letter, written on the stationery of the American Sociological Society.

"It will be found to corroborate, in minutest detail, every statement of fact that appeared in Editor & Publisher under my name. By the same mail I had a note from President Henry Churchill King, of Oberlin College, of whom I had also inquired, saying that he had talked with Professor Miller and could add nothing to what the latter had written.

"In case any reader should be interested in the origin of my story, may I say that my attention was first drawn to the subject by an editorial note in The Christian Century, a weekly religous publication which of late has been bitter in its attacks upon the newspapers, expressing the wish that some one of the foundations might investigate the press and its news sources. A few weeks later it carried another short editorial, announcing that a reader had informed the editor that the investigation it coveted was already under way. Dr. Miller's name was given as the responsible executive.

"Thereupon I sought fuller information, not having before heard of the movement. Upon receiving this, it seemed to me, as a newspaper man jealous for the good name of the press, and as a foreign correspondent who had had personal experience abroad of censorship and propaganda, that this investigation should proceed in cooperation with the newspapers, and not in antagonism to them: for the press is more zealous for full, free uncolored news than any body of outsiders could possibly be. This move by the scientists and educators appeared like a rare opportunity for the vindication of the press.

"Therefore I laid the matter before Editor & Publisher, and was urged to write the article that very afternoon. I did so: had I waited, the story would have had fuller corroborative details, but it would not have been one whit more accurate than when it did appear."

Indiana

IS THE Heart of the Nation's Population

THE heart of any national campaign determines the strength of results and the life of your advertising effort. To be sure of that "heart" you must first be sure it is in the correct place.

Indiana is right in the heart of things—commercially and geographically. It is the center of the nation's population with over three million people, having the highest percentage of native born whites—92 per cent.

No other state enjoys the peculiar advantages of Indiana. Within the state is also the geographical center of manufacturing. It is in the middle of the great corn belt and is located in the center of a belt of wheat. It lies across the path of great trunk lines and its own steam and electric lines spider web in every direction.

Indiana newspapers—especially those listed in this announcement—are stimulant for this great, responsive "heart" where life is at its height.

When you buy advertising in the dailies mentioned below, you deal in known quality and quantity—they are the undisputed leaders in business getting.

USE THEM TO TELL YOUR MESSAGE TO INDIANA.

WHAT'S WHAT IN THE FEATURE FIELD

AT the suggestion of William Allen White, the Cosmos Newspaper Syndicate, New York, has created what it calls "The World's Greatest Editorial Board," and what it claims is "something different" in syndicate service.

Cosmos is a newcomer in the syndicate field. Herbert S. Houston, publisher of Our World, is editor-in-chief and president; Myles F. Lasker, vice-president and general manager; Edwin Muller, treasurer, and Ethel Paine, secretary. It announces "The World's Greatest Editorial Board" as its most important feature.

Twenty-five leaders in American thought and 10 leaders in other countries constitute the Board, of which Mr. White is first member and chairman. Each member is to contribute one signed editorial of 300 words every month. Included on the board are Tagore, representing India; Prince Tokugawa, Japan; Nansen, Scandinavia; Paul Dupuy, of the Paris Petit Parisien, France, and Lord Burnham, England.

Other contributors to the new syndicate include Madame Emma Calve, opera singer; Paul Poiret, fashion authority; John Martin, children's features; Georgette LeBlanc (Mme. Maeterlinck); Dr. W. J. A. Bailey and Dr. W. H. Ballou, science series; Winifred Harper Cooley, "Woman's Life and Love"; Louise Davidson, daily cartoons, and Wells Hawks, New York Letter.

Calling attention to an alleged "wild scramble of imitation" in regard to football features for the coming season, the Christy Walsh Syndicate, New York, has issued a friendly warning to newspaper clients claiming it is the only syndicate authorized to offer signed articles by Tad Jones, Yale coach; Knute Rockne, Notre Dame, and Glenn Warner, Stanford.

Four other syndicates, according to Christy Walsh, claim to have these same football coaches under contract. The trio have signed a statement "disclaiming responsibility or authorization for any other articles bearing our signature."

Frieda Wyandt, a young New York girl, has written a series of articles for the New York World News Service, relating her experiences as an American working girl in European cities.

Herbert Corey's series "Real Workers at the National Capital," suspended during the summer, will be resumed shortly by the Associated Newspapers, New York. Corey will also continue his daily "Manhattan Days and Nights" stories about New York life.

Frank Murphy, treasurer of the McNaught Syndicate, Inc., New York, is spending 2 weeks' vacation at Fourth Lake in the Adirondacks.

"Al" Posen, creator of "Jingle Belles" for the United Features Syndicate, New York, has returned to New York from a summer vacation spent at Lake George.

Ed Brown, formerly with the McClure Newspaper Syndicate, is now connected with the Readers Syndicate, New York.

Clarence Gettier, who draws "From Sue to Lou" for the Bell Syndicate, New York, has created a new 2 column comic, which runs under the caption "Girlie Gags."

John Held, who draws "Oh Margy!" for the United Features Syndicate, New York, spent several days recently with the Spark Brothers Circus, collecting ideas for his feature.

"Bill" Roper, head football coach at Princeton University, is writing a twice-a-week football feature for the Bell Syndicate, New York.

Elsie Janis will shortly resume writing her weekly feature "If I Know What I Mean" for the Putnam Syndicate, New York. The feature was discontinued during Miss Janis' summer engagement in Europe.

John H. Millar, president of Associated Editors, Chicago, returned to this country this week from a 6 weeks' business trip abroad.

"Diana's Diary" is a new fashion comic strip announced by the Bell Syndicate, New York. Names of the creators are not disclosed.

A. C. Ring of the Reader Syndicate, Inc., New York, sailed on the Mauretania, Sept. 10, for an 8 weeks' trip abroad. He plans to sign up many new features while in England and on the Continent.

Miss Gladys Banner formerly society editor of the Jacksonville (Fla.) Journal has written a serial "Sally's Temptations" for the Publishers Autocaster Service, Inc.

Sidney A. Silberman of the National News Service has returned to his Philadelphia office after an extensive business trip throughout Pennsylvania.

Andrew T. Gump, famous statesman brought into prominence by Sidney Smith of the Chicago Tribune, formally threw his clay pipe into the ring as a candidate for the presidency when a huge bronze statute of himself was unveiled at the entrance to the Smith estate at Pridehurst, Lake Geneva, Wis., on September 6. The event was under the auspices of the Forty Club of Chicago and Richard Henry Little, "Line conductor for the Tribune, spoke in praise of the 100 per cent for the people candidate." More than 200 persons were present.

Retiring City Editor Honored

Sixteen men from the news room of the San Antonio Evening News attended a farewell banquet which they tendered Webb C. Artz, retiring city editor, who has since left to assume his new duties as city editor of the Houston Press. Artz had been with the News 4 years.

EDITOR VACATIONS WITH CIRCUS

Fred E. Sterling Returns from Two Weeks Tour with Ringling Brothers

Editors find novels ways of spending such vacations as they are able to snatch away from their desks.

Lieut. Gov. Fred E. Sterling of Illinois, editor of the Rockville (Ill.) Register-Gazette, joins America's largest circus when he goes vacationing.

Governor Sterling has just returned from a two weeks' tour with the Ringling Brothers-Barnum & Bailey circus as the guest of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Ringling. Joining the "biggest show on earth" in Chicago, he "made" Danville, Indianapolis, Terre Haute, Evansville, Mattoon, spent three days in St. Louis and then wound up at Springfield with the Ringlings.

It was not a new experience for Governor Sterling, however, for in many years past he has spent several weeks each summer touring various parts of the country with the "big tops."

For 25 years or more he has been an intimate friend of John and Charles Ringling, and has been their guest on numerous summer jaunts through the middle west. The Rockford editor made the trip in the Ringlings' private car, and there was plenty of time for an occasional side trip to the links or the bathing beach.

The victorious faction of the International Typographical Union celebrated its victory in the union election on May 28 with a testimonial dinner in the Hotel Alamac, New York, Sept. 14, to Fred N. President-Elect Lynch was toastmaster. He gave Mr. Cornell full credit for "the return to power of those who in the past stood for conservatism and sturdy upbuilding of the organization."

"DO your Christmas Shopping Early" posters were issued this week by the New York Retail Merchants Association.

New York has no corner on Christmas shoppers.

Thanksgiving turkey and all the fixings will soon be using newspaper space.

And remember plenty of stores will have Hallow'een novelties on hand to sell shortly.

Furs are being advertised extensively in New York newspapers nowadays.

As the birds fly south, men too, must go down in their cellars to overhaul furnaces.

Cold weather chases out the ice man's copy, but brings in ads for indoor swimming pools, hunting equipment, winter sporting goods, ice skates, etc.

"FIRE PREVENTION WEEK" is not far off. Get busy on a section for this occasion. A good idea would be to sell space to advertisers urging them to devote their space to fire prevention cuts and the copy in connection will express their thanks for the protection received from the local fire department. The edition could be made more attractive by using red ink in printing.—George C. Marcley, Ogdensburg (N. Y.) Republican-Journal.

Young girls and young ladies and older ones, too, are always interested in ornaments for their hands and arms and necks as well as ornamental things for wearing on dresses. Yet the jewelers don't advertise one half as much as they should! Bracelets, charms, rings, etc., ought to make good subjects for your jeweler to advertise. Take this suggestion around and tell him about it! You are sure to get more than one extra ad! R. John Gibler, 2100 Pine St., St. Louis.

A mileage contest for used cars can easily be made the basis of a spread for used car dealers. In the contest itself, every buyer of a used car is eligible to register the mileage reading of his car at the start of the week following purchase, with a $25 cash award to the driver whose speedometer registers highest at the close of the week, the dealers sharing the amount of the award. Stunt attractive to dealers as showing the worth of the used cars sold by them. —B. A. T.

Shingle roofs, tin roofs, automobile tops, poultry houses and other small buildings are going to have a hard time this Winter if they are not protected against the coming bad weather. Paint them; paint protects. Make sure you won't have leaky roofs this Winter. And that's a subject for the painters in your town. Go after them for some advertising. They will welcome more business. —R. John Gibler, 2100 Pine St., St. Louis.

As many furnaces and heating apparatus did not give entire satisfaction last Winter, this Fall the tinners and heating and plumbing men will want to correct these defects in a great many homes, and provide the families with great comforts. Can't you have them call attention to the fact that they will repair and recondition boilers and furnaces by taking space and thus remind the public of a greatly prevalent delinquency?—C. M. Litteljohn, Washington, D. C.

At this time of the year dairymen are thinking of increasing their milk and butterfat production per cow. To do this it requires better stock in the form of purebread animals. A series of ads may be sold to the banks of a farming section on the value of purebred stock, emphasizing the fact that the bank will back such purchases.—Lincoln R. Lounsbury, Pullman, Wash.

Restaurants in small towns, where there is not much transient trade, should be induced to run their menus for Sunday dinner in Friday's newspaper. By Saturday night most people have their Sunday provisions purchased. Consequently the appeal of the Saturday night restaurant ad comes too late to influence them.—Robert B. Mills, Marion (Ind.) Chronicle.

There is an ever increasing popularity these days among noon-lunchers of sandwiches. People are showing more and more preference for sandwiches for their noon-time eating. Why not, therefore, get up a page of ads of local eating houses which make a specialty of sandwiches? With an appropriate heading over this page it shouldn't be very difficult to fill the page full of advertisements. --Frank H. Williams, Fort Wayne, Ind.

Combining a general "Trade Extension Sale" with a drive for circulation in suburban cities proved a good stunt for a Michigan newspaper. Dealers were advised that on a certain date, this newspaper would distribute free copies to every house in the various suburban cities, and that those who advertised special "trade extension offers" in those issues would profit accordingly. A special section of 8 pages was obtained for three days under the plan.—B. A. T., Springfield, O.

TRADE COMMISSION ACTS

Three Companies Cited for Misleading Advertising

The Lexington Storage Warehouse Company of New York and the Nugrape Company of America of Birmingham, Ala., have been cited by the Federal Trade Commission for alleged false and misleading advertising in connection with their businesses. The New York company is charged with falsely claiming to be a factory sales agency and the Alabama concern is said to have represented its product as grape juice when its product was chemically producted.

The Commission this week ordered Katz and Davidson of New York to cease and desist from advertising shirts made in America as English broadcloth.

Merger of Four Weeklies Planned

A new company, the Ottawa Printing Company, organized at Port Clinton, O., with $100,000 authorized capital, has obtained options on the purchase of four weekly newspapers in that city. The merging of the newspapers will eliminate three of the publications and the remaining paper may be issued as a semi-weekly. The papers in the deal are the Ottawa County News Democrat, the Ottawa County Republican, the Progressive Times and the Ottawa County Herald. The incorporators are Walter H. Cole, Wilmington; Charles Graves, Oak Harbor; A. L. Duff, S. A. MaGruder, S. F. Mitchell, Port Clinton.

A. C. Davenport Retires

A. C. Davenport, for the past 7 years manager of the Chicago Drovers Journal, and secretary-treasurer of the Drovers Journal Publishing Company, is retiring on account of continued ill health. He has disposed of his interest in the publication, and will shortly go to Florida to live. He began his newspaper work on the Omaha Bee. In the late eighties he became associated with the Omaha Daily Journal-Stockman, where, with one brief exception, he served continuously, successively as reporter, editor and manager, until he came to Chicago in 1917 as manager of the Drovers Journal.

Held Joins Muskogee News

Carl W. Held has been named managing editor of the Muskogee (Okla.) Daily News, an afternoon publication established two months ago by Muskogee business men. For the past 4 years Held has been managing editor of the Muskogee Times-Democrat. He began his newspaper career with the Hamilton (O.) Sun and has also served on the Hamilton Republican News, Fort Smith (Ark.) Southwest American, Fort Smith Times-Record, and the Bisbee (Ariz.) Daily Review.

The time for submitting advertisements and plans of advertising campaigns for the Harvard Advertising Awards Competition will close at 5 p. m., Friday, Oct. 10, according to a statement issued this week by the Harvard Business School, under the jurisdiction of which Edward W. The Harvard Business School states also that announcement of the details of the competition for the second year of the awards will be postponed until recommendations by the Jury of Award, in the light of the first year's experience, have been received. TO DISCUSS COST REDUCTION

Topic Will Feature Industrial Advertisers Meet in Chicago

With plans for the annual convention of the National Industrial Advertisers' Association to be held at the Edgewater Beach Hotel, Chicago, Oct. 13 and 14, practically completed, Keith J. Evans, advertising manager of Joseph T. Ryerson, Inc., Chicago, in charge of the program, has declared that the meeting will perhaps be the largest and most important gathering of industrial men and women ever held.

"Reducing the Cost to Sell from Industry to Industry" will be the central theme for all the meetings. Efforts are being made to obtain Secretary Herbert Hoover as one of the speakers. The members of the progress already obtained include several industrial authorities.

Ezra W. Clark, advertising manager of the Clark Trutracter Company, Buchanan, Mich., and president of the Engineering Advertisers' Association of Chicago, is preparing the exhibit for the convention, a complete showing of industrial advertising material.

Prior to the formation of his own company he was associated with the Guarantee Trust Company.

HUNCHES

ONE DOLLAR WILL BE PAID FOR EACH "HUNCH" PUBLISHED

THERE is crystalizing a feeling that presidential election year is not a bugaboo in business after all. What does the president of your local Chamber of Commerce or Board of Trade think about this overrated ogre and bad times symbol? Prosperity can be created by knocking him in the head now, and incidentally his exposition will create more advertising for the business office.—C. M. Litteljohn, Washington, D. C.

What's this? August displacing June as brides' month? This condition appears to prevail in some sections and a local investigation may serve to reveal a startling innovation. It is said that young office ladies who go away in June and July, to the mountains or seashore on their vacations, come back with diamonds. Thus is added a new peril to vacations. Better look into it.—A. C. Regli, Eau Claire, Wis.

Send one of your reporters to the railroad shops for an interview with several of the engineers on "The biggest auto boob I ever saw." Get fool stunts auto drivers pull when approaching a railway crossing with the train in full view. The engineers on passenger runs will be the most humanly interesting; and they're full of good stuff.—G. C. Terry, Waverly (Ia.) Independent-Republican.

No doubt you know that lots of folks try to repair the electrical wiring in the home themselves when anything goes wrong; that many are fixing it so the garage is a part of the house itself, but do you know that often these two things cause the home owner's fire insurance to be void? There are many other things that the householder is liable to discover to his sorrow in case of fire. Why not tell him before the loss occurs?—B. A. T.

There's a deaf and dumb man in your town who has been there for years and who is well-known in the community. He's been seeing and thinking all these years while most of the rest of the town has been talking and listening. An interview with him will make mighty good reading. What are his views and observations? What does he do for pastime? What are his likes and dislikes, his hobbies?—Yandell C. Cline, Columbus (Ind.) Republican.

The annual apartment hunt is on. With the hegira to the other parlor, bedroom, kitchenette and bath only a couple of weeks off, Mrs. Average Tenant undoubtedly is again tearing her hair in wonder if this year's chase is going to be as leatherwearing and brain-wrecking as last year's. A good story on rents, higher or lower, demand for rentals, new homes, gas and electric meter installations is available. An ad might be pulled from moving firms, coal and utility firms.—L. J. Jellison, Dubuque (Ia.) Times-Journal.

Are bicycles still largely used in your city by men and women in going to and from work? It would be interesting to make a check at various large factories of the city of the bicyclists as they came to work and as they left work and to tell how many girl bicylists there are among the number.—F. H. Williams.

It seems as though "the bobs" predominate, but do they? Post yourself on a prominent thoroughfare some afternoon and keep a record for an hour or two of the number of females that pass having bobbed hair and those who do not. The facts of the case can be worked into an interesting story that will undoubtedly be read by 100 per cent of the fair sex.—Robert B. Miller, Marion (Ind.) Chronicle.

The college and university students offer a new field for circulation, and one that can be handled easily. Your paper is like a letter from home. Put it up to the fathers and mothers to keep their children thinking of home ties by sending them your paper. Most newspapers print lists of students who go away to college each Fall. Use this for your solicitors or send out sales letters. A special student rate for the nine months they are in school will make your proposition the more attractive. If the news rooms haven't compiled a list of the students put a little box on page 1, announcing you want the names and addresses of those going away to college.—Yandell C. Cline, Columbus (Ind.) Republican.

As a feature, good for 500 words or more, a story of the things found in the pockets of clothing sent to the dry cleaner, has proven successful. The left hind foot of a grave-yard rabbit, two $10 bills, rattle-snake rattles, queer pocket pieces, automobile parts, pens, pencils, pills, etc., are among the items found by one dry cleaner in one month's time. It makes interesting reading, and is a good puller for advertising for the dry cleaners.—Jack Hampton, Plymouth, O.

"Being a Newsboy Is Splendid Training, Business Man Says," is the title of a feature article used recently. Some business man should be interviewed for a story of this kind. Bring in the fact in your article that the carriers' work in distributing the paper to the readers is of the utmost importance. His job is to pass out the concerted efforts of the reporters, editors, pressmen, advertising men and many others. If the carrier fails in his part of the job then all the rest of the work of publishing the paper is lost. Rules about the proper delivery of the paper, collecting, etc., should also man on how this training fits the boy for business should be incorporated.—H. M., Logansport (Ind.) Pharos-Tribune.

"The Hardest Job I Ever Handled." Get policemen and firemen to relate experiences—run one daily. Stories told by policemen and firemen are circulation makers.—George C. Marcley, Ogdensburg, N. Y.

With the reopening of school an interesting story can be written concerning the graduates of the school who have become great figures. This article will be timely and be used with advantage to demonstrate to the present school children the possibilities of their future.—I. S., Washington, D. C.

EDWARDS HEADS TEXAS GROUP

Elected President of the Northwest Press at Wichita Falls Meet

Will C. Edwards, editor and publisher of the Denton (Tex.) Record-Chronicle, was elected president of the Northwest Texas Press Association at its closing session in Wichita Falls recently. E. L. Covey, editor and publisher of the Goree (Tex.) Advocate was elected vice-president, and George Barber of Mineral Wells, secretary.

Mineral Wells was selected as the 1925 convention city.

R. H. Nichols, editor and publisher of the Vernon (Tex.) Record, retiring president, and E. A. Carlock, editor of the Paducah (Tex.) Times, were appointed by President Edwards as members of the executive committee.

More than 50 editors and members of their families attended the convention. The visitors were guests of the Texas-Oklahoma Fair Association for luncheon, and of the two local papers, the Wichita Falls Record-News and the Wichita Falls Times, at a banquet, at which Frank A. Baldwin, editor of the Record News, was principal speaker.

CORRESPONDENTS ORGANIZE

Annual Picnic Gatherings of County Scribes at Peekskill

Annually, for five years, the county correspondents of the Recorder, Catskill, N. Y., are the picnic guests of the publishers of that flourishing newspaper. This year they gathered at a private park, danced and sang and played and made speeches, and the newspaper awarded prizes for highest scores in regular correspondence service. These correspondents have organized a society, elected officers, and regard the Recorder as something more than an employer.

The minute repercussions which in volume total the forces which work out the destiny of the cotton crop are as interesting as any romance of land and sea, and it is these repercussions, the atoms of the market activity of which

• • • Where the Rate Card Ends

A cautious announcement of a Merchandising Service

AN AGENCY representative is speaking to a News solicitor in the former's office:

"What circulation have you got now?"

"Over eight hundred thousand. The rates are based on 750,000."

"That's fair enough. Now how about a little co-operation?"

"How little do you want?"

"Well, we have a questionnaire here to feel out the field. Only about thirty-seven questions. Cails on five hundred dealers will be about right, and it's very important that we get this dope by next Wednesday."

"I see," says the News solicitor.

"Then we'd like to have you send out a letter and a broadside to all the prospective dealers in New York, and let us have some men to make calls with our client's salesmen. Now we've also got a window trim that's a wow. You might put in a couple of thousand for us."

The News solicitor somehow conveys to the agency representative the fact that The News is not in a position to satisfy his requests. Often the agency representative protests that some other newspaper in New York has done or is willing to do the things he asks. Then the News solicitor must usually begin to sell him all over again the fact that our business is limited solely to furnishing white space at the lowest rate in the paper that has the largest daily circulation in America—and let it go at that.

IT IS a curious inconsistency that the advertiser, who has mainly been responsible for stopping the publisher from getting subscriptions by giving premiums, should insist that the publisher give all sorts of premiums to get advertising.

The A. B. C. report is a definite, inflexible statement that has greatly discouraged the ancient practice of getting readers by giving parlor clocks, dishes, magazine subscriptions, armchairs, library sets, oil paintings, real estate, trips to somewhere, fountain pens, admissions to the County Fair, life insurance, bicycles, chances to win a goat or a reputation.

But a rate card, although it is prepared in the four A form and reads plainly "per agate line" is sometimes assumed by advertisers to include copy and art service, plates, mats, mortgages on the front page, research, trade surveys, route lists, sales work, direct mail, window trimming, posters and counter displays, and free passes to a dog show.

All or any of these items are occasionally requested by the advertiser as "co-operation." And the mention of "merchandising service" on the part of the publisher is sometimes interpreted as an admission of altruism.

The News does not give such forms of "co-operation." We find it difficult enough to somehow run a newspaper without carrying on various side lines and perquisites. We limit our co-operation to getting out the best possible paper we can, to giving the most circulation at the lowest possible rate and to taking care of all advertisers impartially.

Some newspapers do give many of the extras mentioned above. Many advertisers forget that it is impossible to get something for nothing—even from a publisher. These extras are frequently covered by a rate that includes them as well as white space and circulation.

WE ARE now giving to some National advertisers a cautious, conservative and limited form of "merchandising service."

This service consists of the services of three men—two actively and one in an advisory capacity. One of these men has had several years' experience with merchandising and merchandising campaigns. He has written merchandising plans, and sometimes helped to carry them out. He knows something of this market. Out of his experiences he remembers chiefly the mistakes that were made, the precautions that were not taken, the oversights in the product, prices, selling methods, and advertising.

The second man, who is actively in charge of this work, has had a splendid education in economics and business practice, some selling experience, some merchandising experience and an exhaustive acquaintance with the New York City market, gained chiefly by making on foot a census of retail stores in all parts of the city over a period of five months. He knows something of market analysis, distribution and selling methods, and advertising.

The third man has been a specialty salesman and trade investigator.

There is no impressive field force. We believe that the only worthwhile merchandising service we can give is our knowledge, experience, and judgment, and not cheap foot work, mechanical motions, routine activities! We do not believe in duplicating the advertiser's own efforts in selling the market, nor in furnishing subsidiaries to a sales campaign.

We will not make hundreds of calls on retailers to get information on questionnaires that are often involved and darkly mysterious. If you want trade information on New York City and as an advertiser are entitled to it, we will try to supply it if we are able. State your problem fully and tell what you want to know. Don't send an elaborate questionnaire and demand a certain quota of calls on the promise of hypothetical campaigns from dark horse advertisers.

We will not sell goods for anybody.

We will not furnish or mail broadsides, form letters, or window posters, nor distribute, book orders or check up on window displays.

BUT to an advertiser who will expend what in our judgment is the proper amount of effort to achieve the end he has in mind in this market—and who will place with us an adequate contract for space in The News, we will try to do the following things:

(1) Ascertain and advise on market conditions.
(2) Help to plan or advise on selling campaigns.
(3) Furnish comprehensive district maps that show the purchasing power, density and type of population.
(4) Arrange introductions to jobbers, brokers, or make jobbing connections.
(5) Loan route lists for the use of the advertiser's salesmen.
(6) Address sales meetings and make sufficient calls with salesmen to show them how to merchandise the advertising.
(7) Check up on sales work.

THUS FAR, what we call our Merchandising Service has been very successful. We believe it is worthwhile, and so do some of the advertisers who have experienced it. It does not increase our cost of doing business or compel us to charge a higher rate. We will maintain it if we can help the advertiser get more business in New York, avoid mistakes or expense; and if it will make more advertisers for The News. But we will not maintain it as a premium to be bought instead of the medium.

Requests for this sort of service from present or prospective advertisers in The News are invited.

The Committee serves you as Guard by avoiding ill-advised changes which would not make the Intertype more profitable to users—and by standardizing all new features so that they can be applied to your outstanding Standardized Intertypes. Before new improvements are adopted as standard, practical tests are made under actual composing room conditions, often for a period of several months.

Investment Bankers to Spend $250,000 For Institutional Advertising

Cleveland Convention Approves Campaign, Which Will Start After Jan. 1, to Reach 6,000,000 Income Taxpayers—Committee Now Seeks Newspaper and Magazine Arguments.

By MARSHALL R. HALL

CLEVELAND, Sept. 24.—The investment Bankers' Association of America, assembled here at its 13th annual convention, yesterday adopted unanimously a proposal to carry to the public an educational campaign involving a quarter million dollars of advertising. The action came on the heels of an urgent plea by John W. Prentiss, retiring association president, made Monday, that this be done. Mr. Prentiss said the money so expended would be returned ten fold to the bond men, and that there was no way to estimate the value of the good will that would thus accrue.

It will be physically impossible for the advertising campaign to start before next January 1, because the publicity committee in whose hands the campaign will rest, will need the next 3 months to perfect plans, prepare copy, select the media to be used, and the more important, raise the quarter million dollars to be spent.

Whether newspapers or magazines will get the money so spent remains to be settled by the committee. While it was not officially stated in the convention, private information from high sources in the association, given EDITOR & PUBLISHER is to the effect that in all probability the committee will call on representatives of both the newspaper and national magazine field, to appear before it and advance whatever arguments they may. have.

The committee will meet in the immediate future, at the call of the chair, probably in New York City. Probably at that time the newspaper and magazine advertising experts will be called in. One thing is certain, however, the business will not be split among two or more advertising agencies. your correspondent is able to state authoritatively. It will be placed solely in the hands of one national advertising house. From here, it appears that two New York agencies and one Philadelphia house and one Chicago concern have the edge on landing the business.

Robert K. Stevenson, Jr., of Stevenson, Perry, Stacy & Co., Chicago substituting for John W. MacGregor of Pittsburg, who is ill in Arizona, on Tuesday presented the publicity committee's recommendations and plans. Summarized, these are as follows:

Every salesman of any class of merchandise has 3 obstacles in the way of his success, namely the convincing of his prospect that (in this particular case) stocks or bonds are logical investments, that a reputable investment house is the place to buy them, and that a particular house can satisfy the requirements of a particular investor.

"Our task," says the report, "is a huge nation-wide merchandising problem that can be solved only through education. The really big and important thing we have to sell is not securities, but the integrity, the highly trained ability, the years of experience and the truly great service the investment banker puts into public business. Great as it is, it all sounds tame to the public beside the feverish promises of great rewards offered by gambling and wildcat speculation."

That, in a nutshell, tells what the Investment Bankers Association has to overcome, and the advertising program will be aimed to educate the public into trusting in the I. B. A. members and patronizing them to the exclusion of fly-by-night promoters. The report says further:

"Your committee, therefore, has in the making a plan for reaching the 6,000,000 income tax payers of this country, their families and their friends, through an advertising campaign to cost for a year in the neighborhood $250,000. The combined circulation of the media will be something like 11,000,000. It will reach millions of homes with a strong, interesting story of the I. B. A."

The committee expressed opposition to direct mail advertising in the following paragraph:

"Direct mail advertising is effective where the reader is already informed and interested, and wants to buy, and simply desires to know where. No large national businesses have been built on direct mail advertising except the mail order houses. Moreover, to accomplish a national acceptance of the I. B. A. through direct mail advertising, the expense would be almost prohibitive, were the task to be done right."

The committee then summarized as follows:

"How will each individual member house gain? How will each salesman profit? Co-operative advertising action will sell more stocks and bonds to more people and will make stocks and bonds easier to sell. The individual house will find its present battle more than half won. What a happy situation to look forward to. Not competition with ignorance and predjudice, but competitive rivalry among ourselves to make life more interesting as the investment house business rises to higher possibilities and greater public service than we have ever dreamed of."

President Prentiss in urging the adoption of an advertising program Monday, when the convention opened, said in part:

"If the Investment Bankers Association of America is to continue its progress it is essential that the public possess a clear and more comprehensive understanding of the work performed by the members of the association; that the public realize that investment banking is a national activity extending far beyond the confines of the Wall Street of fiction; that the public have a keen and clear realization that investment banking exists only for the public's benefit, and only to the extent that the public does benefit directly and indirectly, can investment banking prosper.

"And this brings me to the subject of advertising that economic force which so effectively brings before the public any story of fact and understanding quickly, vividly and honestly. As many of you know, there has been for several years a long and earnest discussion going on among members of your board as to whether or not the association should advertise. By this I do not intend to imply that the association would advertise either the name of a security or the name of one of its members. The type of advertising which the Board of Governors has been discussing is purely educational. It would mention the name of no house, it would mention the name of no security. It would simply advertise the functions, the aims, the ethics of the Investment Bankers Association of America.

"The matter finally came to a vote at the July meeting of the board and your publicity committee at this convention will make a complete report on the subject. I do not now intend to go into any of the details of that report, but, in order that you may be giving the matter some consideration I wish at this time to call your attention to the value of advertising.

"We all know that one of the quickest ways to get the attention of the public is by advertising. We have all seen great industries built up almost entirely through advertising. We represent a great industry. We have something to sell to the public. In order to sell successfully our goods to the public we must first sell ourselves—sell the honesty of our business—sell the economic necessity of our business and sell the idea to the public that if they are going to buy securities the first thing that they want to do is to go to an honest dealer in securities.

"Such a campaign is going to cost money. That money will have to come from the contributions of our various members. The treasury of the association has not got it and cannot provide it. I believe that every dollar contributed by any member of this Association toward the expenses of this proposed advertising campaign will return itself tenfold to that member. It will improve his standing in his own community. It will improve the standing of the association in the eyes of the public and it will save for the honest industry hundreds of millions of savings which are now heedlessly and needlessly lost."

MAKE IT A NATIONAL DRIVE!

EDITOR & PUBLISHER respectfully refers to newspaper and advertising executives the facts published on this page concerning the action of the Investment Bankers Association of America, as an evidence of what can be done through united action and definite program to stimulate advertising service.

That every city of the United States has been contributing its quota to the enormous sink-hole of fraudulent investments has been known by editors and publishers for years. Many newspapers have fought it. But legitimate investment bankers, whose responsibility and liability is direct, have not until now been induced to make an organized attack on this monstrous, wasteful evil by the most direct means—advertising.

The association at Cleveland appropriated $250,000 for the purpose. As newspapers reach all of the people the bankers desire to address and, as EDITOR & PUBLISHER pointed out to the bankers three weeks ago, an adequate newspaper campaign need cost no more than $250,000, obviously the entire appropriation should be made for newspaper advertising. It will be a mistake to split it up with other media.

EDITOR & PUBLISHER now urges advertising managers to present all of the facts concerning the "bad investment" evil to local interests financially concerned in curbing local loss of capital through get-rich-quick enterprises, and campaign for local copy to supplement any national advertising that may be scheduled to newspapers through the Investment Bankers' Association of America.

Make it a local as well as a national drive! Put the underworld of banking, slicker dealers in fake stocks and bonds, out of commission! Save to your readers and your city huge contributions annually made to the cats and dogs of the securities market! Tell the thrifty citizen how to pick and choose safe and profitable investments! Every honorable banker, every civic enterprise, should support this drive with advertising! It is an obvious and long-neglected duty!

AMON G. CARTER ELECTED PRESIDENT OF 10TH DISTRICT CLUBS

Publisher of Fort Worth Star-Telegram Honored at Galveston Meeting—Texas Contennial and Houston A. A. C. W. Convention Discussed

GALVESTON, Tex., Sept. 24.—The Associated Advertising Clubs of Texas closed a successful 4 day convention here today at the Hotel Galvez by electing Amon G. Carter, publisher of the Fort Worth Star - Telegram, president for the ensuing big international convention year at Houston. Other officers chosen were: first vice-president, Garret B. Clark, Galveston; second vice-president, H. A. Randall of Sinton, Tex.; third vice-president, Paul Heisig, El Paso; secretary-treasurer, Will S. Wood, Fort Worth.

AMON G. CARTER

Resolutions passed supported internal action with respect to abolishment of war; code of ethics; loyal and unstinted support of Houston in plans for entertaining visiting thousands of advertising delegates who are expected for the A. A. C. W. convention beginning the week of May 10; establishment of a Texas Good Will Committee to bring about state of good will between Texas cities with a sub-committee to call attention to relations of good taste and to promote spirit of "all for one and one for all;" employment of a paid fee secretary and manager and the organization of a speaker's bureau of Texas clubs.

Lowry Martin, Corsicana, former manager of the State Dailies Association reported on the formation of a committee of 100 Texans elected by Senatorial districts to promote the Texas Centennial and World's Fair, of which Judge Sells is chairman and Lowry Martin, secretary. The committee of the whole is to meet in Austin Oct. 15, for the organization of a program calling for a $50,000,000 budget for a fair to be held in Texas in the next 5 or 6 years, the idea having been endorsed by advertising clubs, Kiwanians, Rotary, Lions, commercial organizations, churches, universities, and colleges.

Dale C. Rogers of Houston, president of the 10th district clubs presided. Attendance was over 100. Carl Hunt, manager of the Associated Clubs made a stirring talk emphasizing the growth of the truth movement in the past dozen years which is now supported by a $1,000,000 appropriation for the ensuing year. Hunt urged a real get-together of all Texas in an effort to sell the World Texas and Texans, and the establishment of double the present number of Texas ad clubs. Hunt told with sincere regret of Lou. Holland's indisposition and of his doctor's orders requiring complete rest and relaxation from cares and responsibility.

Other speakers were Monsignor Kirwin of Galveston, chaplain of the Houston On-to-London committee; James W. Brown, publisher of EDITOR & PUBLISHER, who discussed building advertising the profession; Gurney Lowe of Neosho, Mo., who told of the clubs' educational program urging that the larger clubs to play big brother to the smaller clubs; Carl Williams, editor of the Oklahoma Farmer-Stockman who gave a close-up intimate view of the farmer's buying power; T. M. Darlington of the San Antonio Express who discussed newspaper advertising urging good, honest, truthful copy with good, honest, truthful store management, reduction of retailers' prices, and proper store system. W. W. Pigue of the Houston Post-Dispatch also presented the course of newspapers, pointing to the fallacious thinking of some advertisers that because they advertised in newspapers they had the right to suggest and try to dictate editorial policy. The subscriber was the only customer to whom the editor owed allegiance, he declared, and ridiculed the position ideas of some advertisers, stating that run of paper position was best.

R. H. Cornell of the Houston Chronicle introduced Mgr. Kirwin. He spoke of the great services rendered to organized advertising by Father Kirwin at the overseas convention.

Outdoor advertising was discussed by Bert Cheney, United Advertising Corporation, of Dallas, and Wm. Brockhousen, Sunset System, San Antonio. Direct by mail advertising was discussed by Hix Smith, Dallas, and E. C. Binkley, Sherman, the latter presenting sample composing that had produced large returns at small cost. J. B. Westover's theme was better stores, and Jack Dione of Houston, told some humorous stories of some so-called modern merchandising campaigns.

The meeting opened with sermons in churches on Sunday on the truth theme. The entertainment program included lunches and dinners by the Galveston Ad Club, Rotarians and Kiwanis, a treasure hunt on beach, and bathing. A mammoth pageant "Truth Triumphant" with 700 Galvestonians taking part was staged closing with a grand ball at the Galvez Hotel.

Fort Worth will be the next meeting place.

NEW NEWARK TABLOID A CLEAN PAPER

First Issue Lively Type and Picture Half-Fold Daily—Announces Editorial Platform—Initial Support Good

"It's all here and it's all true," was the slogan of The Press, the premier number of which was published at Newark, N. J., on Tuesday, being the country's ninth tabloid daily newspaper.

Joseph J. Fiske is president of the Press Publishing Co., Maynard E. Zepp, treasurer, and George D. Smith, secretary. The newspaper is under the editorship of Louis A. MacMahon, formerly assistant director of advertising and general promotion manager of the Washington (D. C.) Times. An "advisory board' of five, two still to be selected, was named.

The Press was priced at one cent delivered, and 2 cents on newsstands. It was announced that the Sunday issue would sell at 5 cents. Both the evening daily and Sunday will be delivered for 10 cents per week.

The first issue was in 32-page form, five columns wide, form depth 17 inches. The first page was given over to a display of news pictures, with two news banner-lines directing attention to stories on the inside. A double- truck of newspictures was the big inside feature. Throughout the paper there was a liberal use of illustrations, but the paper ran more type and longer stories than is customarily used in the New York tabloids.

There was a distinct local flavor, but the Press indicated that it proposes to cover the general news field, liberally supply news-features and pure entertainment and a strong page of editorial comment, backed by a comprehensive editorial policy.

This tabloid, in its first issues, was clean, conservative, high-minded and soundly constructive. Its typography and general arrangement deserved comment as admirable. Its initial press work was poor, a mechanical difficulty which will doubtless be overcome as the press gets into action in its new location.

In addition to several excellently selected news-picture layouts, the editorial department made clever use of syndicate material, in considerable measure supplied by NEA Service. The title line and the trade-mark design, run in the title, remind newspapermen of those long used by the Cleveland Press.

The features in the initial number were not intended to "knock 'em dead," but were well selected, solid reading, without suggestiveness, impudence or sensational exaggeration. These features are of the class that make and hold friends worth having. Almost every class of readers were appealed to, but the respectable, home-loving, city-building, work-a-day American was the one most sought. There was not a "leg-picture," nor a highly spiced story in the first issue. There was not a wild or loose line of type. Amusement, local society, art and sports were well covered.

The editor displayed congratulatory messages from Cornelius Vanderbilt, Jr., Governor George S. Silzer, of New Jersey; former U. S. Senator J. S. Frelinghuysen and Postmaster General Harry S. New.

The "editorial platform" announced by The Press was as follows:

"Elect Coolidge and Dawes.
"Better transportation for Newark.
"Development of Port Newark.
"Lower State and local tax rate.
"Adequate wages for all civil employees.
"Elevation of citizenship through adequate schools.
"City planning program.
"A million population for Newark.
"Modern rail terminals.
"More playgrounds for children."

The editorial salutation was a first-person address by The Press to the public, as follows:

"I am Volume I, Number 1, of The Press, Newark, New Jersey. Inviting myself into the home life of the Robert Treat City.
"Anxious to be neighborly.
"Shunning gossip, but able and willing to share the great responsibility of journalism and citizenship.
"Americanism.
"Complete, accurate, dependable.
"Willing to entertain.
"Anxious to serve.
"Sure to be useful.
"I want to meet your friends and have you meet mine—including Calvin Coolidge and Charles G. Dawes.
"Pipe and all.
"Show you my pictures of men, women and events.
"Lend you them in a neighborly fashion.
"You may read my mail.
"My telegrams from North America.
"Also my cables and radiograms.
"Nothing will be hidden.
"Because my correspondence will be clean—from normal-minded men and women who know how to write what will interest you.
"I'm going to tell you what His Royal Highness, the Prince of Wales, does on his ranch, and show you the pictures I get from there.
"I'll keep you abreast of political affairs in this presidential year.
"I'll let you read all about the latest developments in the new Irish situation. Tell you what the new fashions are like and let you know anything new in business.
"That is a neighborly duty I owe you.
"But most of my efforts are to be devoted to Newark and environs. Because, as neighbors, we want to know more about ourselves than we do about distant acquaintances.
"You will find me in the churches, social circles, lodge rooms, civic organizations, sport realms, at the City Hall, down in Trenton, and, of course, on very intimate terms with Washington and the White House.
"From the beginning you will notice that I have all the news from Newark's stores.
"More than one million agate lines of paid advertising were contracted for by the merchants of Newark before I actually moved into my big red home in Treat place.
"That's neighborliness.
"Proof that I am welcome.
"Certain indication that I am going to be a good neighbor.
"And a permanent resident.
"You'll like the way I am dressed. It's the real fashion nowadays. Cut from the same pattern used by Cornelius Vanderbilt out in Los Angeles and San Francisco—a style he is introducting into Detroit. Cut from the same one the Pattersons used when they founded that wonderful success, The Daily News of New York City.
"Copied also by Mr. Hearst in Boston and on Manhattan.
"Followed by the Scripps-Howard publishers in Baltimore and Washington.
"A good style, without wasting material, but every speck of the fabric simon-pure.
"Thus do I come to life.
"A tabloid in size.
"Gigantic in treasure."

Under MacMahon in the editorial department are: Harry Stevens, city editor, at one time on the Newark News; Victor C. Olmsted, news editor, formerly on the Philadelphia Public Ledger; Bernard G. Kaufman, dramatic editor, formerly on the London Telegraph, and more recently on the Montreal Star; Joe Donovan, formerly Newark Ledger, and Sam Kopp, formerly Newark Call, sport editors; Ivan J. Barr, former columnist on the Omaha Bee, then later on Newark newspapers, columnist; Tom Cassidy, politics, formerly on the Boston Advertiser, more recently on Newark newspapers, and Miss Anna Guenther, society editor, who held this position for six years on the Newark News.

McMANUS GIVES A LESSON IN COMIC ART

Highest Paid Cartoonist in America Pauses From Daily Grind to Explain Subtleties of Profession—Tells of His Twenty-five Years as Newspaper Artist

By PHILIP SCHUYLER

PUFF! Plop!

The lemon pie hit square in the face. Bang! Stars!

A rolling pin has done its duty.

Crashing glass, bumps, black eyes, kicks, falls, question marks, exclamation points and a mighty explosion.

"What is humor?," I mildly asked George MacManus, who is busy "Bringing Up Father" amid this daily devastating hurlyburly.

"By golly, I'm darned if I know—unless it's the good income you get for trying to be funny," McManus replied, putting one hand on a knee, the other under his chin, striving, perhaps, if unsuccessfully, to assume the pose of Rodin's "Thinker."

It was a difficult moment. The man who is making millions laugh could not name the reason.

But the brief silence answered for volumes of bunk. It presented an opportunity to look over the creator of Jiggs, Maggie, Dinty Moore, and the Newlyweds—the highest paid comic artist in the world, according to all accounts, doubtless true.

A comfortable, round, little man, I found him. Smiles came easily to the mouth from one corner of which a long cigar protruded. Brown eyes had a champagne sparkle in them it would be hard to dim.

A gray Prince of Wales felt hat was tilted back on his head. Above the ears one noticed sandy hair was graying. One wondered for a moment if he was becoming bald, but dismissed the thought immediately, because about this gentleman of 41, there is a youthfulness that portliness and thinning hair could never hide. This quality was epitomized in his upturned smudge of a nose; and its complete index was in those twinkling eyes.

That he is "one of the gang" is the simplest possible description of the likable George McManus, and possibly the real answer to his power of making millions laugh.

I had come for a lesson in comic art from the biggest authority I knew about. I changed tactics.

"Tell me how you do it," I suggested. "Play teacher for once, please."

"I'm very busy . . . very busy . . . conference with the editor, you know . . . important conference," began McManus.

He couldn't dangle with dignity long. The essential good nature in him prevailed. And, figuratively speaking, he walked up to the school room platform and proceeded with the interview, playing the roll of pedagogue.

"You should begin with a definition of humor," he insisted stubbornly. "Yet humor is hard to define." And he painstakingly italicized the verb and raised his eyebrow just a trifle in true teacher style.

"Stuff I don't like myself, I often get the most letters or praise about. I never know how a strip is going to take. Everyone sees an idea differently.

"No, you absolutely can't define humor," he added with finality. "People who laugh don't know why themselves."

"But the rolling pin, the lemon pie, and black eyes," the student asked sorrowfully. "Arn't they really funny?"

"Oh," prefaced the scholarly reply, "there's bound to come a certain refinement in American comic art. Slapstick must eventually give way to something subtler. But slapstick is certainly what seems to appeal most at the present time."

McManus was real master now, defending his theories with vigor.

"If you are going to draw comics that sell you can't neglect slapstick today. The crowd likes old stuff. You must dress it up, however. Put new and different clothes on it. Make it seem swell.

"Remember, first of all, there are a lot of people who pretend to be highbrows, who go to a modern so-called high-class show and laugh their heads off at old jokes dressed up. The same jokes may have been used 30 years ago in cheap burlesque, but the different costumes and the gorgeous settings make them funy all over again, and funnier than they ever were before."

Ergo, McManus might have said, there you have the first rule in comic art. Be careful with your drawings. Take pains with every line. The well-dressed joke wins success.

"Secondly," he continued, "make your characters just as human as you can. Of course you must exaggerate their personal appearance and the things they do. But to live they must have background.

"I think of Jiggs as a real person. I have even written his biography.

"He was born in Ireland, you know. He came to this country expecting to find gold on the streets of New York but found bricks and cobblestones instead. He was thrifty and succeeded. But you know the story.

"Thirdly, go with your drawing right into the homes of people. The little things of everyday life, the common places are the funniest.

"Fourth, continually strive for variety. Try to please every sort of person in every strip you do. And this is darned hard.

"Let me explain to you," he went on, and at last I was glad to see the phrase came exactly as though it were from a teacher's lips.

He produced the strip that was appearing in the New York American that day. It was not one of his best, perhaps, but it was typical.

Maggie had asked Jiggs to go to the butcher's and get her some meat. Jiggs protested. He wanted to go to the fight. This was in the first box.

"There, you see, is an every day occurrence, pictured in funny, and now well-known figures," McManus explained. "Wife asks hubby to do an errand for her. Hubby has something else on his mind. Almost every man on the street has been through the same experience so often that he has, if he's wise, passed the point of being angry about it, and thinks it's darned funny. This is the first tickler."

Next, Maggie is shown hurling the rolling pin, because Jiggs persists in refusing. There is certainly action well drawn in the picture. Jiggs lands out on the sidewalk the "sadder and wiser man."

"There's your necessary slapstick," McManus said. "I try to get in it as much rumble and crash as I can. Incidentally, I am told this goes very well in South America. In that country, the men are absolute masters of their women, and they think its a huge joke, when Maggie stands up and sasses Jiggs back."

McManus' finger now indicated the next frame. Jiggs is at the butcher's shop. The balloons contain the words spoken by Jiggs. "Good Lord, Maggie forgot to tell me what kind of meat she wanted."

"There is a little subtler form of humor, for readers who are above slapstick," McManus suggested. "Poor Maggie, got so mad that she forgot what she was getting mad about.

"Really, though, I don't understand humor. I don't know why the people like it.

"In this business when you are appealing or trying to appeal to so many different kinds of people, you have to avoid everything that is really comical—such as liquor.

"The best and, what I think are the funniest ideas, you can't use.

"But now, to continue the game. You are a young would-be cartoonist, I am supposed to tell you what to do.

"Well, the best advice I could give you is to become connected with a newspaper. Perhaps you can't get a job as comic artist right away. All very well. I don't care what you do. Be an office boy. Carry copy in the editorial room. And on the side keep drawing all the time.

"Then you're right on the spot, when opportunity comes. You get to know the sort of stuff your editor likes.

"Art schools and correspondence schools are all good enough in their way, but it is being right on the spot that counts."

"Did your father draw," I asked, wondering if artistic ability is hereditary.

"Never commercially," McManus replied. "He just monkeyed' around with it."

The elder McManus, however, I happened to know, had the same easy sense of humor that characterizes George of today. He was manager of the Grand Opera House in St. Louis, Mo. Theodore Dreiser mentions him as a wit in the "Book About Myself."

"Yes, Dad was quite a wit," the son took up the story. "He used to have rubber hooks in his office at the opera house. Visitors would come in, hang up their coats, which would drop to the floor, as soon as they turned around.

"Dad would never crack a smile. The chumps would do their stuff time and again before they noticed the joke.

"Then, it was the custom for Beau Brummels of St. Louis to leave their cigars on a railing in the foyer. During the acts, Dad would put tobasco sauce on the tips. . . .

"He wouldn't let me hang around the theatre. Of course I wanted to. After school I would come down with a bunch of kids.

" 'See here,' Dad would say, 'there's a fine park just a nice ride from here.'

"He would give us some money and shoo us off to the park. It would take just long enough to keep us from playing around the opera house."

McManus first drew public attention to his work when he was 13 years old. He drew a picture of a youngster with a turned up nose and a generous sprinkling of freckles, while in the class room. His teacher demanded to see the drawing.

"I expected a whale of a licking from the school ma'am," said the cartoonist, "but apparently she felt my dad could give me a sounder thrashing, and so she sent this bit of art with a few others she found in my desk to my father.

"He was very quiet during supper, and I fancied the strap would get its workout just before bedtime. Instead he quietly asked:

"Did you do that?"

"I admitted it, and without a word, he went out of the house. The next morning my father told me to get on my hat and coat and go down to the St. Louis Republic to work. He had brought the freckled drawing to the editor, and it made a hit. I worked for a year at $5 a week, and then was given a dollar raise. That was 24 years ago, and I've been drawing cartoons ever since.

"When I was 21, I came to New York and drew comics for the New York World. You remember 'Panhandle Pete.' 'Let George Do It!' and 20 other comics that I drew during that time and since. The others pass out of memory of the average reader of funny pages. They all ask: 'How did you strike the popular characters of Jiggs and Maggie?'

"It was this way. Indelibly in my mind since childhood remains the picture of old Billy Barry, the best Irish comedian of his day. My dad was in the show business, and I used to see Barry in his play quite often. I remember every detail of that play. It is practically the same as 'The Auctioneer' of today with the change of the leading character. The character portrayed by Barry is the Jiggs of today, and his wife Maggie is the same leading actress in that play. They used to have a poker game every night at 9:15, and there were people in St. Louis who would flock into that house just to see the real poker that was played. It was one of those friendly games where the players carried bricks and axes for emergencies.

"It's the public which makes a comic successful. I tried out a dozen, until 'Bringing Up Father' struck the popular fancy. That was a few years ago when I joined the Hearst organization."

Up in the building that houses the King Features Syndicate, aspiring and perspiring cartoonists clamor almost daily for recognition.

And McManus, turning Rotarian, tells this, as the "one thought" he would "leave with them today."

"Get a job on a newspaper. No matter how small or inconspicuous it is.

"Be on the spot, when opportunity comes."

ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH FILES SUIT AGAINST HOUSTON NAMESAKE

Asks Injunction Prohibiting Use of Title by Texas Daily—Claim Copyright Protection—Also Seeking Damages

ST. LOUIS, Mo., Sept. 24.—The hearing of the motion for a temporary injunction sought by the Pulitzer Publishing Company, a Missouri corporation, publisher of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, to restrain the Houston Printing Company, a Texas corporation, from using Post-Dispatch as a name for its newspaper, probably will be held in Houston on Oct. 11. This will depend upon whether Federal Judge Ben C. Dawkins of the Houston division of the Southern District of Texas, who has been absent from home, returns by then.

The petition which seeks a perpetual injunction from a continuation of the use of Post-Dispatch or any similar words as a name for the Houston paper, also asks for an accounting of profits and for damages. Judson, Green & Henry, of St. Louis, attorneys for the Pulitzer Publishing Company, filed the petition at Houston on Sept. 15, and it is sworn to by A. G. Lincoln, secretary of the publishing company. The petition states that the Pulitzer Publishing Company has been publishing the Post-Dispatch since 1878, when the name was adopted as a trade mark and that it has "spent more than a million dollars in advertising its newspaper under the trade name of Post-Dispatch and in extending its circulation and distribution under said trade name throughout the United States and on August 1, 1924, its daily and Sunday editions circulated in every state of the Union and in all of the principal foreign countries of the world, the circulation of its daily paper exceeding 220,000 copies and of its Sunday paper exceeding 350,000 copies and that on Aug. 1, 1924, its Sunday paper had an average circulation of 24,100 in Texas, in Louisiana 2,000, Arkansas 12,000, Oklahoma 20,000, in city of Galveston, Tex., 1,521 copies, and in city of Houston 335 copies, and its daily paper had a smaller circulation throughout all of said states."

The petition states that "from 1878 until Aug. 1, 1924, the complainant was the only newspaper in the United States using this name or any similar name, and in consequence thereof, although the words St. Louis were sometimes printed on the paper in connection with the words Post-Dispatch to indicate the place of publication and the address of its publisher, these words formed no part of its trade name, and said newspaper was ordinarily handled by dealers called for and bought and sold by the name Post-Dispatch without the said prefix of 'St. Louis.'"

On March 15, 1924, the complainant filed application for registration of the trade mark of Post-Dispatch, without addition or inclusion of the words "St. Louis," or of any other words except those two, the petition states. This name was admitted to registration on July 10, 1924.

The petition relates that on or about Aug. 1, 1924, the Houston Printing Company acquired control of two newspapers published in Houston, Tex., known as the Post and the Dispatch, merging them into one "and fraudulently contriving and intending to reap the benefits of the reputation and good will complainant had established for its newspaper," established the name of the Post-Dispatch or Houston Post-Dispatch, and has wilfully persisted in publishing, circulating, and distributing its said newspaper under said name after having been notified in writing by complainant that it was unlawfully infringing complainant's said trademark and was unlawfully hindering and interfering with the sale of complainant's said newspaper, and was engaged in unfair competition."

It is related further that "while the defendant uses the word 'Houston' in connection with the words Post-Dispatch as the official name of its paper at the top of each page, yet in its editorial columns and in its advertisements it refers to and mentions its newspaper merely as the Post-Dispatch without using the word 'Houston' in connection therewith and the newsdealers and agents who handle and sell said newspaper in Texas and adjoining states, most of whom also handle and sell complainants' newspaper, frequently speak of both papers merely as the Post-Dispatch, and the readers who buy said papers or either of them, frequently ask merely for the Post-Dispatch so that this identity or similarity of name leads to confusion and it frequently happens that purchasers intending to buy copies of complainant's newspaper receive copies of the defendant's paper in the place thereof, and by reason of this unlawful conduct of defendant in circulating and selling its said newspaper the name reputation, circulation and sale of complainant's newspaper has been and will be greatly interfered with, diminished and decreased to its irreparable damage and injury."

The petition states that "the value of the said trademark involved herein is greatly in excess of $5,000."

POST-DISPATCH HEARING OCT. 11

Injunction Suit in Court at Houston or Monroe, La.

HOUSTON, Tex., Sept. 25.—Federal Judge Ben C. Dawkins, of the North Louisiana District who went to Brownsville, Tex., to hold court this week, has set Oct. 11. as the date for the hearing in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch's petition for temporary injunction against the Houston Post-Dispatch.

The hearing will be held in Houston if Judge Dawkins, acting in absence of Judge J. C. Hutcheson, has time to return then otherwise the hearing will be held in Monroe, La.

SIR GEORGE SUTTON REVIEWS RESULTS OF WEMBLEY A. A. C. W. MEET

By Herbert C. Ridout

(London Editor, EDITOR & PUBLISHER)

WHEN Sir George Sutton, chairman of the Amalgamated Press, Ltd., presided at the general meeting of the company on Aug. 26, he made an interesting reference to the Advertising Convention of 1924.

Sir George said: "You have all read of the great Advertising Convention held last month at Wembley. This firm, like many others, lent moral and financial support towards the bringing to London of many hundreds of prominent business and advertising men and women from all over the world to discuss the practice and value of advertising. The results abundantly justify the efforts made.

"Apart from the fellowship and good will which the convention stimulated, I believe that on the practical side it achieved much. It directed the attention of the entire business community to the mission of advertising: Increasing production by the encouragement of demand. There is no doubt that the most important result of the convention will be an all-round increase in the volume of advertising. By that increase your company, in common with other publishing houses, will largely benefit."

WILLIAMS APPOINTED S. N. P. A. MANAGER

Secretary to Senator Harris Will Fill Specially Created Position Oct. 1—Former Editor of Americus (Ga.) Times-Recorder

Cranston Williams, of Greensboro, Ga., has been appointed to the position of manager of the Southern Newspaper Publishers' Association. He will make his headquarters in Chattanooga, Tenn., and will take up his new duties Oct. 1, working under Walter C. Johnson, secretary-treasurer of the S. N. P. A. He has been serving as secretary to United States Senator William J. Harris, of Georgia.

CRANSTON WILLIAMS

The office of manager is a new appointment created at the last annual meeting of the S. N. P. A. which provided for the selection of a manager to assist the secretary-treasurer, Walter C. Johnson, of Chattanooga, who has held this office for the past 8 years.

Chattanooga will remain the headquarters of the S. N. P. A. because of its splendid geographical location, being easy to reach from any part of the country.

Mr. Williams was educated in the public schools after which he attended Emory College. He was reared in a country printing office, and has done everything from setting type, job and press work, on up to filling the editor's chair. He was editor of the Americus (Ga.) Daily Times-Recorder from 1915 to his entry in the United States army during the world war. He entered the first officer's training camp and served through the war. In France he was commanding officer of the Machine Gun company, Fifty-Sixth Infantry, 7th division, resigning from the regular army in which he had enlisted early in the war. He attained the rank of captain.

Mr. Williams served as secretary to United States Senator William J. Harris, of Georgia, from the time of his return from France in 1919 to date, and was his campaign manager in 1924. He is a member of the National Press club, Washington, D. C., a Scottish Rite Mason, a Shriner, and a member of the Sigma Nu fraternity.

Speaking of Mr. Williams, John S. Cohen, president and editor of the Atlanta Journal says:

"If the field were scratched with a fine tooth comb I don't think a more worthy person could have been selected for the place. Captain Williams is a newspaper man of the first water, industrious to a degree, and a personality which will carry him and any organization which he represents over rough spots with the least amount of friction. He has been pronounced by close observers in Washington as the best private secretary at the capitol. I have been a private secretary to a cabinet officer myself, I know that it requires ability, tact and poise to a very great degree to get away with the job. That is the reason I gave it up after six months of service.

"I think the Southern Newspaper Publishers' association has been exceedingly fortunate in securing his services."

Cowan Directing Coolidge Caravan

John P. Cowan, former newspaper man and editor of Pittsburgh First, organ of the Pittsburgh Chamber of Commerce, is in charge of the "Coolidge-Dawes-Lincoln" tour that started from Plymouth, Vt., on Sept. 9. The caravan reached Pittsburgh Sept. 19 and newspaper friends of Mr. Cowan tendered him a warm welcome.

REPORTING NATIONAL POLITICAL TRIANGLE

500 News Men Exclusively Engaged in Telling the People of the Remarkable Battle of Three Parties—New Methods Include Sectional Headquarters Where Big News May Break

By PHILIP SCHUYLER

ONE of the most remarkable political campaigns in American history is being reported in the columns of the nation's press.

Although the campaign was late this year in getting under way, at the present time interest is mounting to fever heat and the press has dived into the contest in earnest.

Nearly 500 newspaper men it is estimated, are making national politics their daily assignment, while more than 75 have been definitely assigned to cover the 3 principal candidates and their running mates.

In New York alone there are 30 newspaper men, covering the three party headquarters.

All over the country more money than ever before is being spent gathering news of the contest.

Unlike past partisan conflicts, none of the 3 major protagonists is content with one main national headquarters.

Whereas in other presidential years, Republicans, Democrats and in the days of Roosevelt, Progressives, maintained a principal directing office in one city, usually either New York or Chicago, with branches in other cities, this year Coolidge, Davis, and La Follette have no fixed headquarters.

There are 3 cities from which at any time any day important political statements may be issued and news emanate. They are New York, Chicago and Washington. All three cities have to be watched by the newspapers with equal care.

William M. Butler, Republican National Chairman, Clem Shaver, Democratic National Chairman, and Robert M. La Follette, Jr., who is handling his father's campaign, gravitate between New York, Chicago, and Washington.

On Monday of this week for instance, Butler and Shaver were in Chicago, and La Follette, Jr., was in Washington.

On the same day, Senator La Follette was in New York; Davis in New York; and Coolidge in Washington.

Coolidge, although he is staying close to the White House, while other candidates swing about the circuit, must be covered carefully for political breaks. The ordinary White House assignment is not considered adequate, and all press associations and leading newspapers, have arranged with special men to cover this source of political news.

Additional expense is contemplated by press associations in collecting and distributing election returns in November, because of the La Follette candidacy. With the exception of the Roosevelt Progressive campaign, news agencies have heretofore only collected the returns of the Democrat and Republican parties, paying scant attention to minor parties in the field.

Already press associations are completing arrangements to report these election returns. But today, chief newspaper interest centers in the vote-pulling tactics of the three major candidates.

And to answer the question how is the political campaign being reported now, the writer this week visited the New York headquarters of the three parties and talked with the newspaper men who are bearing the brunt of the great political story.

At all headquarters, EDITOR & PUBLISHER was informed by officials that the respective parties were entirely satisfied that newspapers of the country, while differing in their editorial support, were in the great majority of cases absolutely unbiased and fair in their news columns.

According to the modern custom, a large portion of present day political news passes through the publicity sieve before it is served up to the public through the newspapers.
